Even after announcing his resignation, Carlin was adamant that the University continue to keep its costs down.

"We still need to dramatically lower tuition and fees," he said. "Colleges and universities charge the students too much to go." He suggested that UMass cut spending by "managing their costs a lot better, and being more productive."

He also suggested that, in his absence, the Board of Education should focus on the educational impact of the internet.

"I think the faculty has to start thinking about how the internet is going to affect their work," he said. "It's going to change how teaching takes place in this country."

Soldiers return home after Rev. Jackson meets with Milosevic

By George Boehmer
Associated Press

RAMSTEIN, Germany — Three U.S. soldiers released by Yugoslav authorities stepped off a plane at a military base in Germany yesterday to salutes from their Army buddies and wild cheers from a flag-waving crowd.

Their arrival after more than a month in captivity capped an emotional, daylong journey by land and air from Yugoslavia's capital.

"Free at last, free at last, thank God Almighty, free at last," they chanted as they walked across the Yugoslav border into Croatia and hand-in-hand with the Rev. Jesse Jackson, who arranged their release in Belgrade hours earlier.

There were no signs that the soldiers' release would prompt a new diplomatic initiative or a halt in the NATO bombing of Yugoslavia. The alliance continued to attack the Balkan nation yesterday.

The soldiers, dressed in Army fatigues, were exuberant and appeared healthy, standing tall and walking briskly. But they still showed signs of the cuts and bruises they suffered when captured on a patrol mission along the Macedonia-Yugoslav border on March 31. They told journalists that they were treated humanely but glad to be out.

"It's a great relief to be free," Staff Sgt. Christopher I. Stone, 25, of Smiths Creek, Mich., said during the stop at the Croatian border town of Bajakovo. He said his scars and bruises came from his capture and after that, "the maltreatment stopped. We were treated very well," Staff Sgt. Andrew Ramirez, 24, of Los Angeles, added later before boarding the plane to Germany. "We're doing good, we're healthy. As you can see we're very happy. Mostly happy."

On the night before their release, the soldiers said, they were too excited to sleep.

A nine-man color guard with six flags and a 27-man honor platoon, dressed in full combat gear, from their C-9 military plane as it arrived at Ramstein Air Base from Zagreb, Croatia. As the soldiers stepped out, a jubilant roar went up from the 400 Army personnel and their families who had waited for hours on the tarmac with U.S. flags and big "Welcome Home" signs.

"It does not get any better than this!!!" read one huge banner hung with yellow ribbons from an aircraft stairway ramp. "God bless America" read another.

The three, carrying American flags folded under their arms, walked onto the tarmac, saluted the honor guard, then immediately boarded two UH-60 medical evacuation helicopters to be flown to the nearby Landstuhl Regional Medical Center, a U.S. military hospital where they were to undergo medical evaluations.

UM service study completed

Decisions on whether or not to privatize the University of Massachusetts Food services and bookstore are edging closer with the recent release of a consultant report.

The report was done to explore the best method of delivering the highest quality and most reasonably priced goods and services in its food and bookstore operations. In charge of the report was a team of consultants hired by Chancellor David K. Scott and the Board of Trustees. Team members came from the Campus Bookstore Consulting Corporation of East Longmeadow and the Cornyn Fasano Group of Portland, Oregon.

"The consultants were not asked to make any recommendations, but were asked to study, evaluate and present their findings to the campus community," Vice Chancellor for Administration and Finance Paul Page said in a press release.

Beginning their study in early March, the team summarized the advantages and disadvantages of various types of operations, which included assessing the continuation of self-management by the University or turning it over to private corporations.

In response to campus concerns about the decline in student employment if management of retail food services was turned over to private contractors, the report addressed the student's concerns.

"Regardless of the management option selected for food service, demand for student workers would increase if demand for food service were to increase," the report said in a press release.

According to the report, today's students want increased food service availability and are looking for "four to six quick food opportunities," instead of the three sit-down meals.

"The emphasis is on quick, efficient food available at a variety of hours (including after 9 p.m.), access to multiple food options and opportunities for carry-out," the report said in a press release.

Just as students are becoming interested in buying books on-line, the report suggested setting up a web-page/fax line to permit pre-orders for lunch with pick-up at a predetermined time.

Other suggestions included exploring the feasibility of adding computer terminals and more entertainment in the Bluewall Cafe, leasing an espresso cart on the Campus Center concourse and early-evening dinner specials to attract off-campus patrons before they head home.

Strategic initiatives suggested for the bookstore include a long-term plan to combine the University Store and the Textbook Annex, installing air conditioning in the Annex, widening exits and entrances, reconfiguring check-out areas in the store to reduce long lines and improving security by installing closed-circuit television and video recorders.

The reports will be reviewed by Chancellor David K. Scott and the Chancellor's Executive Advisory Committee. The campus community can make recommendations to the University's Board of Trustees.

Police charge man with three London bombings initial claims of minority targeted bombs discredited

By Robert Seely
Associated Press

LONDON — Police charged a white man with murder yesterday in a nail-bombing campaign against gays and ethnic minorities in London that has killed three people and wounded more than 100.

David Copeland, a 22-year-old engineer, worked alone in all three bombings and was not a member of the neo-Nazi groups that claimed responsibility, authorities said.

Copeland was arrested early Saturday at his home at Cove, southwest of London, and will appear in court Monday, Metropolitan Police Deputy Commissioner Alan Fry announced.

He has been charged with the deaths of three people killed in the worst explosion, a nail-bomb attack Friday in a gay pub in central London, and with similar attacks April 17 and April 24 in London districts with large ethnic minorities. A total of 115 people were wounded.

Nineteen of the more than 70 people injured in Friday's explosion remained hospitalized, including six in critical condition. Among the victims were people who had limb amputations and others with severe burns.

A neo-Nazi organization, Combat 18, claimed responsibility for the first two explosions in the Brixton and Brick Lane neighborhoods of London. The White Wolves, believed to be an even more radical offshoot, said they were responsible for Friday's attack. But police said yesterday that the claims appeared to be hoaxes.

Police said they had seized "combustible materials" from the suspect's house, and that he appeared to be the man captured on closed circuit TV in Brixton who was suspected of planting that bomb there.

In the pub bombing, witnesses reported seeing a man with a blond goatee leaving a bag in the Admiral Duncan moments before the explosion. Police said the bomb was a "relatively rudimentary and crude" device about the size of a shoebox packed with nails and other metallic objects.

Two of those killed in the pub in the heart of London's Soho district were identified yesterday as a 27-year-old pregnant woman, Andrea Dykes, and the best man at her 1997 wedding, John Light, 35. Her husband Julian Dykes, was badly injured.

Relatives, quoted by yesterday newspapers, said the group from Colchester, 55 miles northeast of London, had gone to the capital to see the musical "Mamma Mia" and dropped by the Admiral Duncan.

Prime Minister Tony Blair, addressing Sikh religious leaders in the central England city of Birmingham, said the Sikh message of tolerance "could not be more relevant."

Heston says enforcement, not more gun laws, the answer

By Jim Abrams
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — National Rifle Association President Charlton Heston said yesterday that better pursuit of criminals, not new gun laws, is the best way to prevent a repeat of the Colorado high school shootings. An administration proposal to impose new background checks on gun purchasers, he said, "smells of tyranny."

Heston, in his first national interview since the shootings at Columbine High School, told ABC's "This Week" that he would also oppose President Clinton's attempt to limit handgun purchases to one a month.

"Before you know it, it becomes no guns," he said, emphasizing the NRA argument that gun control advocates are trying to build up momentum for more comprehensive restrictions on gun ownership. The NRA has been on the defensive since two teenagers killed 12 students and a teacher at the Denver area high school before committing suicide. Some 8,000 people demonstrated outside an NRA annual convention in Denver Saturday to decry the NRA's hard-line positions on gun ownership.

But Heston insisted that "the problem is not the availability of guns," but the failure of the Justice Department to enforce what he said are more than 2,000 laws controlling the sale and ownership of firearms.

"I'm not interested in denying them purchase," the former actor said of convicted felons, who would be targeted by Clinton's proposal to extend waiting periods included in the Brady Law. "I'm interested in seeing them imprisoned. There are plenty of laws to do that."

Clinton, in the most far-ranging gun-control package since the Brady Law passed five years ago, is seeking to raise the legal age for handgun possession from 18 to 21, hold negligent parents liable, halt imports of all high-capacity ammunition clips and limit handgun purchases to one a month.

He would also mandate child-safety locks on all guns sold, impose background checks on buyers for all gun-show sales, and require a three-day waiting period for all handgun purchases. Today most checks to verify that a would-be purchaser doesn't have a criminal record are done instantaneously.

"How can anyone say that those requirements are not reasonable?" said Deputy Attorney General Eric Holder, also on ABC.

Holder rejected the NRA's "slippery slope" argument, saying that in five years the Brady Law, which requires background checks, has prevented 250,000 people with criminal records from getting guns while people's legitimate rights to buy guns have not "been restricted in any kind of major way."

The Clinton package faces an uphill fight in Congress, where the Republican majority has long been suspicious of gun control, and Senate Majority Leader Trent Lott, R-Miss., echoed Heston in saying the answer to youth violence lies in better enforcement rather than more laws.

ISTANBUL, Turkey (AP) — U.S. warplanes bombed Iraqi air defense sites yesterday after being fired on in the northern no-fly zone, a U.S. military spokesman said.

U.S. Air Force F-15s responded after being "targeted by Iraqi radar and fired upon by Iraqi anti-aircraft artillery," said Capt. Manning Brown at Incirlik air base in southern Turkey.

The bombings took place northwest of the city of Mosul, 250 miles north of Baghdad.

All allied planes returned safely to base and damage on the Iraqi sites was being assessed, Brown said.

U.S. and British planes have been patrolling the skies over northern and southern Iraq since after the 1991 Gulf War to protect the Kurdish and Shiite minorities there. Baghdad has been challenging allied planes since December.

BRUSSELS, Belgium (AP) — NATO said yesterday a U.S. Marine Corps AV8B Harrier plane crashed in the Adriatic Sea on Saturday while on a training mission for operations in the Balkans. The pilot was reported safely rescued.

It was the second report of a crashed U.S. warplane in 24 hours operating over and around Yugoslavia. Neither pilot's name was released.

Hours earlier, the alliance said a U.S. F-16 fighter plane had gone down over western Serbia early Yesterday. NATO gave no details of the cause of the crash.

A spokesman for Aviano air base in Italy, Air Force Capt. Ed Thomas, said Yesterday the F-16 pilot returned to Aviano "in really good condition and really good spirits."

The pilot, an American, is expected to quickly return to action. "I know the guy. He's a really, really good officer," Thomas said. "I'd be surprised at anything less. We're so grateful that he's back."

"And out of 12,000 sorties," Thomas said, "we haven't lost a single pilot."

Thomas declined to give details of the rescue operation other than to say that both "fixed wing" aircraft and helicopters were involved. Some of the aircraft were "probably" out of Aviano, although the base is not the primary one for special operations. NATO spokesman Jamie Shea said the AV8B Harrier plane crashed into the sea while approaching a carrier of the Marine Expeditionary Force to land.

Shea said the plane was not involved in attacks on Yugoslavia when it came down and there was no suspicion it has hit by hostile fire.

The Harrier was assigned to the Marine Attack Squadron 231 from Cherry Point, N.C. It is part of the Marine Expeditionary Unit deployed in support of the NATO operation in Yugoslavia.

NATO has now acknowledged the loss of two other aircraft since the air campaign against Yugoslavia began on March 24.

A U.S. F-117 stealth fighter went down over Yugoslavia on March 27. The pilot of that plane was also rescued. An Apache helicopter gunship crashed in flames last week on a training mission in Albania. Its crewmen escaped with cuts and bruises.

JERUSALEM (AP) — Nine centuries after Christian Europe sought to redeem the Holy Land, a group of Western Christians is seeking forgiveness for the slaughter and destruction left in the Crusaders' wake.

Bearing printed apologies in Arabic, Hebrew and English, participants in the "Reconciliation March" said yesterday they planned to hand the neath bound plastic folders to Jews, Muslims, and Eastern Christians whose forefathers were killed during the invasion.

About 50 members of the interdenominational project from the United States, Europe, Australia, and New Zealand are meeting Israelis and Palestinians in cities throughout the region. "Exactly 900 years ago Christians visited this land with a sword and a spirit of vengeance in a manner contrary to teachings and character of Jesus," said Mike Niebur, the group's Israel coordinator.

WTO deadlocked over choosing new director–general

By Clare Nullis
Associated Press

GENEVA — The World Trade Organization yesterday faced the prospect of a damaging leadership vacuum that could undermine its authority in global trade disputes.

Efforts to appoint a new director-general ended in total deadlock after more than 12 hours of weekend meetings that degenerated into bad-tempered clashes between supporters of former New Zealand Premier Mike Moore and Thai Deputy Prime Minister Supachai Panitchpakdi.

Ali Mchumo, chairman of the 134-nation WTO council, reconvened a meeting of the decision-making body for Monday in hopes of finding a solution.

But prospects looked grim, with Asian and some African nations standing firm behind Supachai — seen as the candidate of the developing world — and the United States insisting on Moore. WTO spokesman Keith Rockwell described the atmosphere at Saturday's session as "testy, tense and not terribly pleasant." The impasse and growing North-South split led to fears that a time-consuming hunt for a new leader might have to begin again from scratch despite the impressive track record of both current candidates.

Italy's Renato Ruggiero stepped down as scheduled on Friday after a four-year term in office, taking the WTO's deputy directors with him.

Rockwell said the WTO could continue to function without a leader, although it might pose some problems for the work of panels set up to adjudicate trade disputes. If parties involved in the trade rows can't agree on the composition of the three-member panels, the rules say that the director-general must name the members.

The Geneva-based body faces an upsurge in disputes following the U.S. announcement Friday that it will file complaints to the WTO against Europe, India, South Korea, Canada and Argentina for a variety of alleged unfair trade practices.

Moreover, the WTO needs a leader with global clout as it prepares for a November ministerial conference in Seattle, meant to set the trade agenda for the 21st century and usher in new agreements to liberalize global commerce.

Credibility of accusations of Clinton misconduct doubted

By Pete Yost
Associated Press

ALEXANDRIA, Va. — The credibility of Kathleen Willey, the former White House volunteer who accused President Clinton of making an unwanted sexual advance, is the key to Independent Counsel Kenneth Starr's latest criminal case.

Mrs. Willey's one-time friend, Julie Hiatt Steele, is charged with lying to investigators when she undercut Mrs. Willey's story. The trial, opening today in federal court across the river from Washington, will revive lingering questions about what, if anything, happened between the president and Mrs. Willey in a room next to the Oval Office in 1993.

Mrs. Willey aired her allegation in a national television interview 14 months ago, triggering a furious counterattack by the president's supporters. Clinton denied her story under oath. As part of the Monica Lewinsky case, Starr investigated Mrs. Willey's account but did not assemble enough evidence to include any related information in his impeachment referral to Congress. One reason he did not was Ms. Steele's testimony that Mrs. Willey had asked her to lie to back up the allegation against the president.

Ms. Steele's trial on three obstruction counts and one count of making false statements is the only criminal trial to arise out of the Lewinsky investigation.

U.S. District Judge Claude Hilton has said he will not allow Ms. Steele's lawyers to put Starr's tactics on trial, which happened in the case of Clinton's former business partner, Susan McDougal. In that trial, Ms. Steele testified that she had been indicted because she refused to help Starr. McDougal's lawyer said her client plans to attend the opening of Steele's trial to show support.

Ms. Steele's lawyer, Nancy Luque, argued that Starr's office made a series of misrepresentations in order to trick Ms. Steele into making the statements that led to her indictment.

The defense has subpoenaed testimony and notes from Newsweek reporter Michael Isikoff, who first wrote about Mrs. Willey's allegation, and from CBS for outtakes from a "60 Minutes" interview with Mrs. Willey.

The judge has yet to decide whether to allow that evidence into the case, and CBS and Newsweek have objected to the subpoenas. Mrs. Willey says she confided the alleged advance to Ms. Steele the day it occurred in 1993. Ms. Steele initially supported Mrs. Willey's version of events to Newsweek, then recanted, telling her revised account to the FBI and two grand juries.

She now says the first time she heard the allegation was when Mrs. Willey called her in 1997 and asked her to back up her story to Isikoff.

Starr's office has not said whether Mrs. Willey will testify, but Ms. Steele's lawyers are assuming she will and are marshaling evidence about Mrs. Willey's background that they hope to use to destroy her credibility in front of a jury.

Life is !@#$%

Why is the sky blue? What is the meaning of life? Why can't people put down their arms, and realize they are not as different as they think? Why are so many McDonalds' and Disney employees disgruntled?

These are just a few of the thoughts that conveniently distract me from the chaos surrounding the end of the semester. You may be asking yourself why I titled this week's column !@#$%. While most people associate this assortment of symbols as some kind of expletive, I view it otherwise. In my mind, !@#$% is randomness hiding something quite normal. If you look on your keyboards, !@#$% is just 12345, a set of numbers we use in everyday life. With that in mind, read on.

People are everywhere! They are chillin' around the Campus Center, they are eating at the DCs, and they are walking from here to there. I look around, seeing people laughing, crying, yelling and whining. These people are the constructs of society, a society, may I add, that constricts us. There are people who try to convert me to their religion. There are people who try to convince me that I am ignorant using mindless emotional rhetoric. There are people who claim that they are better than everybody else because of a difference of class, race or creed.

Shawn Downs

I once asked myself, "Why are there rallies, celebrations, and special topics in the media just for gays, lesbians, blacks, Jews and women?" The answer is simple. Everything else in society flaunts the white Anglo-Saxon Protestant (WASP) male.

It is written in the "Book of Boo" that, "No person is an island because the tempests of society threaten to flood and erode them away." In layman's terms, this means that people cannot fight the system because they become part of the system. You may try to be different, or to express your beliefs by wearing old clothing, letting your hair grow, becoming a vegetarian or saving the environment.

However, if you smoke (an obvious representation of mainstream society), and you do what most smokers do when they finish a butt (flick a finished butt on the ground), isn't that polluting? If a squirrel comes along, eats it, and dies of poisoning, would its existence been fulfilled better if it were on someone's plate? Of course, it's not a scientific fact that squirrels are stupid enough to eat butts or that they are poisonous to eat. Its a hypothetical situation, making the point of individualistic hypocrisy.

Speaking of smoking, here's a little !@#$% at the South College building. There is a clear sign on the door saying "No smoking within 20 feet of this building." Right next to the door is one of those newfangled butt baskets with a long neck. What are students supposed to do, smoke 20 feet from the building, then walk with the used butt to the door and throw it away? Sometimes I wonder...

Random notes on myself: I'm tall, blond and have an awesome attitude. I'm 6-foot-4 and built like a football player, but I'm a drama geek. Being tall means I had special abilities and responsibilities. First, I've always had to keep track of people in crowds because I could look over people. "Go, Go, Gadget neck!"

I always bought movie tickets for everyone because I looked five years older than anyone else. "Um... could I have two tickets for... um... you know... Sorority Girls 411?"

And finally, I was never bullied. "Hey buddy, you'd better not push me! Try a push pop!"

Random thoughts on upcoming events: Star Wars Episode I opens in 16 days. That in itself will be a popular culture explosion that the world has never seen. Other notable flicks this summer are Austin Powers II: The Spy who Shagged Me, and Stanley Kubrik's Eyes Wide Shut. On the opposite end of the spectrum, Disney's Inspector Gadget does not do the classic '80's cartoon justice. You see Dr. Claw, for crying out loud!

Oh, I hear the producers of the X-Files are coming out with a sequel to Titanic. In the sequel, aliens are responsible for the sinking of the luxury liner, and everyone dies! Well everyone except Jack, who is abducted, and experimented on. Upon reaching the States, Jack is released, and found to be mentally unbalanced. He is put into a mental institution forever!!!

Uh... my train of thought has slightly derailed. Well, I must return to the world of reality, and write my research papers. Well, its been a pleasure writing to you for this semester, and I hope to see you again next semester. Until then, may the !@#$% be with you.

Death of a journalist

If I died tomorrow, I'd like to be able to say I was a decent guy.

Wait. I wouldn't say anything — I'd be dead.

Let me start over.

If I died tomorrow, I'd like to have some sort of legacy. There. A concept that's not physically impossible and everything.

I want to be remembered as the guy who single-handedly brought Communism to its knees, who coined the phrase: "It ain't over 'till the fat lady sings," and who finally made the moon a safe place to live.

Which means that, if I am, in fact, dying tomorrow, I've got to get cracking. I've got to add all of that stuff to my already stacked schedule that involves all sorts of direly important activities like brushing my teeth and, say, breathing.

Let me jot this down. Communism to knees... coin phrase... and, uh, make moon safe. Got it!

Ah, death; such a motivating notion.

It's a morbid thought, I realize, but it's true. The only time people ever really get going is when death is imminent — and that's when it doesn't really matter.

So many people think that they must accomplish all sorts of incredible things before they move on, but the fact is, they all move on whether they actually accomplish those things or not.

Seth Keonig

And the material things. What's with that? So many of us here are terribly concerned about what kind of car they drive and what kind of clothes they wear. They should just be happy they have cars and clothes. Everybody will end up underground after its all said and done.

A dead rich man is just as dead as a dead poor man. Of course, I'm only saying that because I'm poor.

Then there are all the insensitive adages that go along with the subject of death that would be directed at me if I died tomorrow.

Seth bought the farm.

Great. I can somehow buy a farm in death while I can barely afford to pay the phone bill in life. Where did I get all of this cash? If I'd have known dying was so damn lucrative, I would've passed away a long time ago.

Seth is pushing up daisies.

According to popular culture, I'm a really wussy dead guy. This little phrase is insinuating I can only manage to push up daisies. Well, I'll have all of you know that I maxxed out at 80 pounds above my weight in the bench press (disregard the fact that I only weigh about 140 pounds — it's irrelevant). Back when I actually did anything active, I ran a 4.8-second 40-meter dash, too; not too bad for a journalist, huh? Oh, I'll be moving right along when I'm dead.

Seth kicked the bucket.

Yeah, and I'll kick the bucket really far, too. What do you think about that (Damn, I'm bursting with testosterone when I'm dead)? There. I feel better.

Seth is sleeping with the fishes.

Okay, this is just sickening. I would never sleep with animals — much less slimy aquatic ones. To be honest, I'm not even positive how I'd go about doing that.

Seth has been put on ice.

Sure, me and Brian Boitano will do a show at the Mullins Center together. Come see the extravaganza! Just wait until you see my corpse do a triple axel!

Seth croaked.

Now I'm making frog noises in the process of dying. Why? Why can't I go out with a bigger, meaner animal sound, like a hiss or a roar? People can say, "Seth roared today," and everyone will assume I went down in a blaze of glory as opposed to curling up in the corner and ending my misery with a "croak."

Seth is six feet under.

Alright. I'll give you this one. It's pretty accurate.

So that's my death for you — tomorrow, specifically. If I die some other time, things might not be quite the same. Vini, vidi, vici. Sayonara, das vi danya, ta ta, caio, ariva derchi, au revoir, so on and so forth.

Rules of the road

Life is a precious commodity. We value our lives and the lives of our families. Occasionally, when the media decides it's worthy, we value the lives of strangers. But when a complete stranger's life is in their hands, some people just don't care.

Recently, some news programs have made it a public issue stating emergency vehicles aren't getting to and from their destinations fast enough, causing lives to be lost. But besides being a public issue, it is a personal issue.

Have you ever been for a ride in an ambulance? Have you ever been strapped to a long board unable to move, unsure if you will be able to walk again? Have you ever had a loved one riding in the same condition?

"You don't use ambulances to get through traffic because they are moving fast. In a few seconds, irreversible damage could be done to a victim."

Joseph D. Savitch

If you answer no to all of those questions you have no idea what I am saying. I have experienced both. I can speak from personal experience and from professional experience. Professionally, I know paramedics, Emergency Medical Technicians (EMTs), doctors and nurses who work in trauma, where every second counts. When the ambulance arrives, they are on a clock. Depending on the type of injury it could be a time limit as short as a few seconds before irreversible damage is done to a victim.

The problem with ambulances and their role in trauma situations is the travel time. They have to get from point A to point B in a very short time. The problem is motorists who don't feel the need to get out of their way. Even with the most experienced staff and the best response time, if they can't deliver the victim to the hospital in a short amount of time then all of their work may be for nothing.

The unwritten rule of the road is: "Get out of the way of emergency vehicles." Simply. It's a matter of consideration, and it's a matter of life and death. I know stories about ambulances stuck behind drivers who won't get out of the way. For whatever reason, they don't feel the need to let an ambulance pass. "Hey, it's okay to finish my U-turn; the ambulance won't mind."

Or the ever-popular: "Hey, there goes an ambulance. Let's get behind it like a fullback, it'll be our lead blocker."

Rule of the road: you don't use ambulances to get through traffic because they are moving fast. They are moving fast because they are trying to save a life. If for some reason they had to stop suddenly and you were right on their tail, many people could get hurt.

I have been in an ambulance strapped to a long board after a sports injury many years ago. I remember only parts of the ride: I was unconscious for the most part. But what I do know is I was scared, scared out of my mind. I have watched my father being carted off in one after a serious myocardial infarction (heart attack), one he never recovered from.

So when you see an ambulance speeding down the road, wonder: Could that be me in there? Is that somebody I know and love? Will you know for sure?

Is it worth it to risk somebody's life to get in the way of emergency medical personnel just because you are in a rush? Is it worth their life?

Letters to the Editor

Fire Department "alleviates concerns"

To the editor:

Thank you for the opportunity to respond Rob Schulze's April 26, 1999 editorial, "Hall burned..., which demands a factual response regarding a fire alarm in Webster dorm, and our response to it.

I can respond on behalf of the Amherst Fire Department because I was the Fire Captain in charge of the Engine Company that responded to the event.

The facts:

1. The firefighter's helmet had "Captain" on it, not "Chief."

2. There was no problem opening the door. It was unlocked.

3. Most importantly, because it refers to our response time, the actual times of the alarm (taken from our Dispatch tape) were as follows:

Time of receipt of alarm: 4:12 p.m.

Engine 2 responding: 4:15 p.m.

Engine 2 on scene: 4:16 p.m.

Engine 2 in service: 4:24 p.m. (also the time students were let back in)

These time show that from the time our engine was toned out to the students being allowed back in the dorm was 12 minutes.

4. Alarms for campus buildings are not received by our dispatch directly. They are initially received on campus and then relayed by phone to our dispatch, which tones out the appropriate crew(s).

Your problem with the delayed arrival of the Amherst Fire Department lies elsewhere.

The most bothersome part of Mr. Shulze's editorial is as follows: "These people are trained and paid solely to protect me and you from events like this. A prompt response can mean not only the saving of property but also the saving of lives. With the police right on campus and two fire stations close by, there is no excuse that will explain this disgrace."

It is the mission of the Amherst Fire Department to deliver prompt and professional Fire and EMS services to all those in our residence area. This includes not only our local residents, but students and visitors as well. I hope these facts alleviate any concerns readers might have after reading Mr.Schulze's editorial.

In a world of technology, cellular phones, hi-definition television, the Internet and ATM cards, I should not have assumed anything could be accomplished without a computer.

On an idle Wednesday not too long ago, I needed a few groceries. After putting my three items on the check-out counter, a 16-year-old wearing frosted pink lipstick and smacking bubble gum rang up my ice cream, six-pack of razors and red Bartlett pears. I wrote a check for 7.36 and handed it over.

"Do you have your Stop & Shop card?" She asked without looking at me.

"Nope," I responded, proud of my decision to stay supermarket plastic-free.

She just stared, bubble gum stuck to her molars and mouth open. She sneered, squinted her eyes and asked, "You don't like have a Stop & Shop card?" Like how dare I write a check and not own a card to scan in my name to the Stop & Shop Information Web. A Web that, for all I know, keeps track of my social security card, grocery preferences, eye color, weight and taste in spiritual partners.

I've always had the heebee jeebees about a computer knowing more about my food and my life than my roommate does. And the conspiracy theory: that my choice in food could jeopardize my health care coverage or, more realistically, put me on a mailing list of glossy "Save... save... save!!!" coupons that inevitably end up scattered on the kitchen table and floor.

"I've always had the heebee jeebees about a computer knowing more about my food and my life than my roommate does."

Julia T. Sears

"Umm, no I don't," I mumbled as my eyes shifted to the people gaining in number and lacking in patience behind me; people who were in the Stop & Shop Card Club, an elite group that seemed to know that it is preposterous not to have one when writing a check.

The aisle 15 express sign started blinking with the flick of a switch. And an ever-wise 17-year-old manager who could have doubled for Joey of the New Kids On the Block, strutted over. His metal link key rope attached to light khaki one-size-too-large cargo pants, and his gelled hair was perfectly combed to make a straight line of bang across his forehead.

"This lady doesn't have a card," the girl said with a raised eyebrow, taunting him to see what punishment he would dish out for me, the outsider. Being called a lady had a negative connotation and made me feel suddenly old. I second-guessed myself. Will Big Brother hunt me down for card evasion and imprint me with a bar code so that I can be scanned in the future?

"You don't have a card?" he sighed. What the hell was this place... $7.36 for Pete's sake. I was waiting for the spotlight and smoke-filled inquisition room with some bloke giving me 20 questions to see if I would waver my testimony.

"Would I lie?" I thought to myself. "Do they think that I am holding out on them? That I have a card and just don't want to admit it?"

"No, I do not have a card. I have a license and a credit card and a school I.D." I stammered. One would think that would be enough. But no, the teen-team scoffed and the manager exaggeratedly put his keys to the register and punched in a code that allowed me to move on.

"You have to go to the service desk and they'll issue you a card," the manager said and then he mumbled something to the cashier. Needless to say, the line in the express lane had become more than restless.

I hung my head in Stop & Shop etiquette delinquency and pouted to the service desk woman who was maybe 15. She asked for my name and address and gave me a temporary card. That's it? A name and an address? Couldn't they have read that off my check?

Acting almost saves this Island

AC musical theatre group opens first show

By Julie Fialkow

ONCE ON THIS ISLAND
April 29
Amherst College Campus Center

The musical Once On This Island, presented this weekend by The Amherst College Cabaret, did amazingly well for what it had to work with — small, cramped space, limited funding and a weak script.

Based upon the novel My Love, My Love, by Rosa Guy Once On This Island, tells the story of two mismatched lovers both living on an island in the Caribbean. One a poor peasant girl, Ti Moune (Maria Boucher, UMass), and the other a rich socialite, Daniel (Nick Adams, UMass) meet when a storm causes Daniel to crash into a beach. Ti Moune nurses him back to health and the two fall in love.

The rest of the story is achingly familiar and only the unique and spirited reggae songs and dances, saved it. Love, of course, is ill-fated because of the two clashing backgrounds of the two.

What keeps the musical fresh and lively is the inhabitants belief in gods and goddesses who ultimately have all the control over their lives. Everything they do revolves around whether or not the gods will approve.

The performances of the gods, Asaka, Mother Earth (Karen Burns, Amherst College), Erzulie, Goddess of Love (Vanessa Colton, Mount Holyoke College), Papa Ge, Demon of Death (Rob O'Brien, UMass), and Agwe, God of Water (Matthew P. Parvis, UMass) added much needed life and enjoyment to a rather bland story. Additionally, the finest vocal performances came from these actors who easily stole the show.

Another standout of the evening was the orchestra who played terrific Bob Marley style arrangements. Members of the orchestra included piano player Eric Wubbel (Amherst College), flute player Carrie Mittleman (UMass), bass guitar player Matthew Wexler (UMass) and percussionists Christopher Sullivan and Marianne Roseland (UMass).

Also contributing to the successful performance were the many storytellers and cast of dancers and singers. Although the songs in Once On This Island, were often trite and empty, the voices that carried them were strong and beautiful. Choreographer Tamara Venit (Amherst College) should be commended for her creativity and clarity, despite her limited space.

Besides the weak script, the only other negative aspect to the performance was the stage set-up. The audience surrounded three sides of the "stage" in a large room in the Amherst College student center. Aside from the audience who sat directly facing the actors on a raised platform, most people had difficulty seeing what was going on. Many moments were missed because they were set downstage and 75 percent of the audience weren't able to see them.

Overall, Once On This Island, proved the wealth of talent we have in the five-college theatre community. Director Adam Roffman (Amherst College) and Assistant Director Rachel Edelman (UMass) deserve congratulations for showcasing and organizing such an event. Hopefully, many more student-run productions will follow in its footsteps.

UM Philly games should be reviewed

What follows is a simple petition for Atlantic 10 commissioner Linda Bruno. The videotapes that caught the entirety of the games that the Massachusetts women's lacrosse team played at Geasey Field in Philadelphia, Penn. will not lie.

In two contests, the first being April 16 against the hosting Owls of Temple, and the second being this past Saturday against Virginia Tech in the opening round of the Bell Atlantic/A-10 championships, the Minutewomen lost twice — each game by a single goal, 6–5 and 12–11, respectively.

Such slim finales are heartbreaking, but are a mere matter of course in the world of sports. It would be wrong for the team on the short end of the scores to make noise about simply losing. Like previously stated, that has to happen in sports.

However, in each of the games Massachusetts played on Geasey Field, glaring questions about the officiating plague the results of the matchups. The die-hard fans and parents who bear the proud colors of maroon and white can't help but leave Temple's enclosure wondering what the results might have been had the calls not been quite so one-sided.

Along the same vein, the Minutewomen, who work hard to obey the rules and play a competitive game, must feel frustrated and disappointed when it seems that they can do nothing legal in the eyes of the officials.

Still, as would any good coach, UMass' Francesca McClellan refuses to point the finger at the referees as a deciding factor in the losses, opting rather to explain the outcomes as Minutewomen shortcomings in some respect — and, of course, in some respect that is true.

Not, however, to the degree that would change a win into a loss.

Against the Hokies in the preliminary round of the conference tournament, Massachusetts was the victim of six free position goals; exactly half of the opposition's total scoring output. The Minutewomen scored only three in this fashion. To make matters worse, though, the overall fouls called dwarfed this uneven ratio, as Virginia Tech benefitted from 21 calls; three times the number of calls that favored UMass.

If the referees aren't under review after such a lop-sided tally, than perhaps Massachusetts should be for its incredibly violent style of play. It is doubtful that UMass, with an athletics program known by many for its sportsmanship, is the problem here.

In fact, when the Hokies came to Amherst to play the Minutewomen at Totman Field, only eight fouls went against Massachusetts, a remarkable swing when the only variable was a change of venue — and officials.

Against Temple two weeks earlier, UMass was called for 15 penalties in the 6–5 loss. The physical nature of the game and the conditions, a monsoon-style thunderstorm, made the officiating even more crucial to the outcome. Yet, it seemed that the same rules were not applying to each end of the field, as the Minutewomen crashed to the AstroTurf on the offensive end with the help of the Owls several times. Rarely was a whistle blown. Yet, similar defending was not missed by the sharp vision of the referees when the Massachusetts net was in jeopardy.

Ironically, this trend only occurs when the playing surface is Geasey Field at Temple University. The reason for this is not known. Five separate games passed this season in which 11 or fewer calls were made against UMass, proving that big numbers in the foul category do not follow the Minutewomen throughout their schedule.

Strangely, once Massachusetts was eliminated from A-10 tournament competition, the calls plateaued. Only four free position goals were scored in the championship game between V-Tech and Temple.

If the videotapes of the two games in question would be viewed, it would be greatly appreciated.

Goalies are story of the game

By Casey Kane
Collegian Staff

As a freshman last season, Syracuse men's lacrosse goaltender Rob Mulligan spent the spring learning his position from Jason Gebhardt, one of the nation's strongest goalies.

As a redshirt last season, Massachusetts goaltender Chris Campolettano spent the spring learning his position from John Kasselakis, one of the nation's strongest goalies.

Friday night, under the lights at Richard F. Garber Field, sophomores Mulligan and Campolettano put on a defensive show that would have made both their predecessors proud.

Mulligan stopped 11 shots and Campolettano made 10 saves as No. 6 Syracuse defeated UMass, 8–6.

To Campolettano and UMass' credit, the eight goals by the Orangemen marks only the second time in 23 games Syracuse has been held to a single-digit scoring total. Even more impressive, however, may be the fact that the Minutemen held their opponents scoreless for the third period, the first time the Orangemen (8–3) have been shutout in a quarter this year.

"Our defense played really well, a collective effort, and our offense did a really good job of holding the ball down there," Campolettano said.

From the outset, fans in attendance knew the evening's contest would prominently feature the two goaltenders. Only 1:05 into the game, the Orangemen came storming toward the Massachusetts (4–8) cage, but Campolettano turned back the attempt.

Gaining possession, UMass raced to the other end of the field, passing the ball until a decent shot was available. But when it was, Mulligan was there to stop it.

It would remain that way for the entire first quarter, and only a late goal by Syracuse's Josh Coffman gave the Orangeman a slight advantage going into the second frame.

"First quarter we came up with some huge saves. We were going save for save," Mulligan said. "Me and Campy are good friends. He played great. It's too bad that he had to lose... well, not too bad."

But in the second quarter the Orangemen got hot, pulling away to a 6–2 lead on goals from Ryan Powell, Coffman, Matt Caione and Brian Sullilday.

"UMass has a tough defense, one of the tops in the nation. We worked and the offense kept the ball rolling too," Mulligan said. "We didn't force that many turnovers offensively, and we controlled the ball. That's all you can really ask for."

The Minutemen got more of what they were looking for in the third quarter, when they were able to stave off every attack Syracuse put in their zone.

"Josh Coffman really hurt us in the first half, so we decided to put two poles up, one on Josh, one on Matt Caione," UMass coach Greg Cannella said. "Defensively we played well, Campy was solid in the cage."

Mulligan deserves just as much credit from the Syracuse side for his work in that quarter as Campolettano does from the UMass camp.

"I thought he played very well. He made some real great saves in tight. He really held them in the game, especially in the second half," Cannella said. "We put some shots on him and he made some real key saves."

From what he saw from his vantage point at the other end of the field, Campolettano said he agreed with his coach.

"My hat's off to him. He made a couple of big saves in the second and third [quarters] that really kept them in the game," Campolettano said.

Minutemen take a step back by getting swept

By Michael Kobylanski
Collegian Staff

They say that bad things come in threes. That couldn't have been more true for the Massachusetts baseball team this weekend.

After having an eight-game winning streak snapped last Thursday with a 4–2 loss to Boston College in the championship of the Beanpot Tournament, it seemed like the Minutemen would have a great chance to rebound this weekend against a lowly Rhode Island squad.

Although the Rams did come into the weekend with a 16–25 record, 4–8 in the Atlantic 10, URI came into Amherst and swept a three-game set from UMass, throwing another kink in what has been an up and down season for UMass.

"We didn't compete all weekend. Very few individuals came to compete," Massachusetts baseball coach Mike Stone said. "We left a lot of guys on base and in scoring position."

For a team that was only playing for pride, Rhode Island appeared to be the first-place team in the division, not the Minutemen. Cheering, screaming, even heckling since the first pitch of the game, the Rams took advantage of 12 UMass errors over the three games and added some clutch hitting and timely pitching along the way.

With two All-Atlantic 10 candidates on the mound on Saturday in Bill Cooke and Travis Veracka, UMass should have dominated the Rams, but they didn't. Neither Cooke nor Veracka had their best stuff, and a porous defense behind the hurlers led to two URI wins.

The Rams took game one 7–6 and won game two 7–4.

"Bill didn't have much juice, and Travis dropped down and didn't have the velocity on his pitches," Stone said.

To make matters even worse, the Maroon and White also lost leadoff hitter and second baseman Shaun Skeffington to a broken wrist in the second game. The junior infielder got tangled up with a URI baserunner while covering first base on a play. According to Stone, Skeffington will be out for the remainder of the season, leaving the Minutemen with a big void to fill from the first spot in the batting order.

The chance to get back on the winning track yesterday in the final game of the series ended up going by the wayside for the Minutemen. URI jumped out to a 4–0 lead after three innings en route to a 6–2 win.

So now UMass (22–15, 10–5 in the Atlantic 10) has begun another streak, as they are currently losers of four in a row. The Minutemen no longer have first place in the division all sewed up. UMass still has six remaining conference games left to play — three against St. Bonaventure at home next weekend and at St. Joe's the following weekend. Although neither one of those teams is over .500, the Minutemen can ill afford to watch a repeat performance of this weekend's disappointing showing as they enter the home stretch.

"We're not all set for the [Atlantic 10] tournament," Stone said. "We've done some things that have distracted us from our goal."

Mowing down the Hokies

Danielle Henderson struck out 33 batters yesterday en route to a sweep over Virginia Tech at Totman Field.

Elway finally decides it's time; announces retirement from NFL

By Aaron J. Lopez
Associated Press Writer

ENGLEWOOD, Colo. — He sounded so very upbeat at the start, cracking jokes and telling stories about himself and his Denver Broncos.

Then John Elway turned to his retirement — and that's when it hit him.

His face crumpled and the sobs came.

"I can't do it physically anymore, and that's really hard for me to say," the 38-year-old Elway said yesterday, pausing frequently to regain his composure as he addressed the crowd at a suburban Denver hotel.

"It's hard to walk away. I can't explain in words how much everyone has meant to me."

After dazzling fans and confounding defenses for 16 years, the quarterback made official what everyone had known for more than a week. He delayed the announcement because of the school killings in Littleton, and his news conference began with a moment of silence for the victims.

Elway, master of the last-minute comeback, becomes the third superstar to leave his sport since January, joining Michael Jordan and Wayne Gretzky.

"The over-under in the locker room yesterday was how many times I'd cry," Elway said through his husky, choked voice. "I took the under."

Then, after crying some more, he added, "I lost the bet."

Elway, wearing a blue-and-silver ribbon on his suit jacket in memory of the shooting victims, was joined on the stage by Broncos coach Mike Shanahan and team owner Pat Bowlen.

Elway's wife, Janet, and their four children sat in the front row. The children smiled at their dad's jokes and remained poised when he broke down. Janet, however, cried as her husband spoke.

"For 16 years, the family life has focused around me and football, and it's time it focuses around them," Elway said. "I couldn't ask for a better mom and dad and a better wife. I'm tough to live with. Thank God she's still with me."

When asked what he'd miss most about Sunday afternoons, Elway said, "I'll never be able to fill the void of playing a football game."

He said he'd miss the huddle and telling talkative tight end Shannon Sharpe "to be quiet."

"I know you're open, I know you're open, I know you're open," Elway said about Sharpe, drawing loud laughs.

Sharpe attended the news conference along with several other current and former teammates, including running back Terrell Davis and Elway's heir apparent, Bubby Brister.

"I guess it's like Haley's Comet," Sharpe said. "It only comes along every 77 years, and I got an opportunity to play with him. That's what it's like."

For years, the only thing missing from Elway's resume was a Super Bowl title, and he took care of that by winning two straight. In his final game, he was voted Super Bowl MVP in a 34-19 win over Atlanta last January.

He becomes the only quarterback to retire after winning a Super Bowl.

"I truly believe John was the very best to ever play," Bowlen said.

Elway was exceptionally durable throughout his career, missing only 15 starts because of illness or injury, but his retirement was hastened by the sheer wear and tear of professional football. He was hit more than any quarterback in NFL history, absorbing 559 sacks in 256 games.

He compiled the best passer rating of his career in 1998, but his season was interrupted by hamstring, back and rib injuries that caused him to miss all or part of six games. His deteriorating, arthritic left knee probably will have to be replaced.

Still, his toughness and productivity might never be equaled. "To John Elway, football was the greatest game in the world," commissioner Paul Tagliabue said in a statement. "And to the game of football, John Elway was the greatest ambassador imaginable. He combined talent and character to become an incomparable performer and champion on the field."

Elway talked about many of the memorable moments in his career, including The Drive in Cleveland in 1986.

"That one put me on the map," Elway said — and even his first pro game on Sept. 4, 1983, in Pittsburgh when he went 1-for-8 for 14 yards with an interception.

"I didn't think I was going to last a year," he said. "Jack Lambert was snarling at me with no teeth."

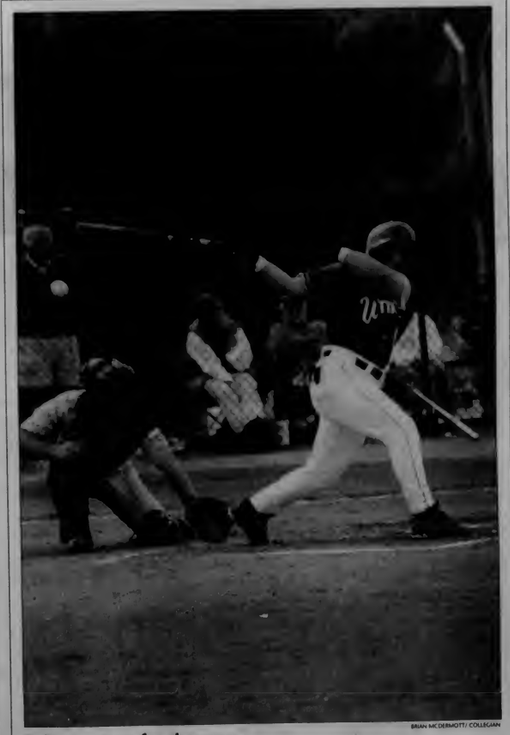
Of course, Elway came back.

He guided his team to more victories (148) than any other quarterback in NFL history. He threw for 51,475 yards and accounted for 54,002 total yards — second only to Miami's Dan Marino. He is the only player ever to pass for 3,000 yards and rush for 200 yards in seven straight seasons (1985-91).

Elway also rallied his team to 47 game-saving drives — more than any other quarterback. He was selected to nine Pro Bowls and was named the NFL's MVP in 1987. He holds 55 Broncos' regular-season or postseason records.

"They talk about 47 comebacks," Shanahan said. "The thing that was so impressive was the concentration level and poise and thriving on pressure."

After three ugly Super Bowl losses early in his career, Elway began to wonder if he would ever get another opportunity.



But thanks to a dynamic running game designed around Davis, Denver went to two straight Super Bowls and won them both. Against Green Bay in January 1998, Elway set the tone by scrambling and diving into two defenders for a first down to set up a Denver touchdown late in the third quarter.

UMass takes two from VT; Henderson fans 33 Hokies

By Matt Frascella
Collegian Staff

The first inning of game one of yesterday's doubleheader between the Massachusetts and Virginia Tech softball teams set the tone for the whole day.

Senior All-American Massachusetts softball pitcher Danielle Henderson struck out the first three Virginia Tech batters in order. In the bottom half of the inning, UMass leadoff hitter senior Mandy Galas blasted a triple. Two batters later Cherra Wheeler singled down the left field line to bring home the fleet-footed Galas.

That one run proved to be all the run support Henderson would need in game one and set the tone for the entire afternoon. Fittingly, the seniors set the tone on an afternoon that was devoted to them.

The No. 17 Minutewomen swept the Hokies 3-0, 4-1 in yesterday's doubleheader at Totman field to capture the regular season Atlantic 10 title and earn the No. 1 seed in next weekend's conference tournament.

Jumping out to an early lead and setting the tone was very important to the UMass squad.

"These pitchers [from Virginia Tech] throw a lot of goose eggs," UMass softball coach Elaine Sortino said. "They aren't used to getting hit like that. I thought it was a great message to send. I thought it was very important that we come out of the box strong and I thought it was great we scored in the first inning."

The story of game one was the continued dominance of Henderson. The senior pitched seven innings of scoreless ball while fanning 16 batters. She only surrendered one run in the shutout.

With the No. 1 seed in the A-10 tournament on the line, Sortino elected to pitch Henderson in the second game as well. Matching her first game dominance, Henderson won her 22nd consecutive game in a row this year. The only blemish on the day to her stellar pitching was one run in the seventh inning of that broke her streak of consecutive scoreless innings. She currently holds the NCAA record with 105 straight innings without giving up a run.

"She is a great pitcher," Sortino said. "She does the right things. She has a great defense behind her. She could care less [about the scoreless streak]. She doesn't get involved in those things. She wants to win. She wants the team to win."

And win is what she did. In the two biggest conference games of the season Henderson and the Minutewomen came out on top.

Henderson was not the only senior that stepped up on senior day. Galas went 2-for-3 in the first game as she showed her teammates that they could hit the Hokies freshmen pitching staff.

"She was a really tough pitcher," said Galas of the VT starter. "It was very important for us to go out and get a hit and prove that we can hit her. I tried to step it up so that freed everyone else up."

In game two starting right fielder Octavia Brown proved that she could hit in the clutch as well. Brown singled home the winning run in front of the home crowd. Galas also was worthy of post game praise from Sortino with a solid second game as well.

"Mandy is always Mandy. Mandy is clutch. She is our go- to-it kid. She comes through big for us all the time. She is a heck of a competitor," Sortino said. "I thought that [RBI] single from Octavia] was a big hit for her to come through with. She got a bat on the ball. She had been struggling a little at the plate and I thought that was a boost for her."

UMass has now won 18 consecutive games, the longest current consecutive win streak in the nation.

Minutewomen Notes: UMass sport marketing students will be promoting Tuesday's home finale against Boston College as Fan Appreciation Day. Game time is 3 p.m. on the Ruth J. Totman softball field.

VT coach admits to stealing signs

By Aaron Saykin
Collegian Staff

Hitting against the Massachusetts softball pitching ace is no simple task.

Opposing coaches have resorted to all sorts of tactics in their attempt to solve the pitching riddle otherwise known as Danielle Henderson.

And after UMass swept a two-game set yesterday against Virginia Tech to clinch the Atlantic 10 regular-season title, Hokie coach Scott Thomas admitted to stealing signs from the Minutewomen.

"I think she's the best in the country," Thomas said of Henderson. "...When you've got somebody throwing the ball like Danielle, I think everybody kind of looks for an advantage."

Although Thomas acknowledges that one of those "advantages" his team resorted to was sign-stealing, he also feels that he's not the only culprit to employ such a tactic.

"I think anybody would [try to steal signs if facing Henderson]."

Between the fifth and sixth inning of game one, UMass coach Elaine Sortino switched the signs she had given to catcher Nikki Faessler from the dugout. Virginia Tech had spoiled Henderson's perfect-game with a base hit in the top of the fifth inning, but after an adjustment in the signs, Henderson tore through the Hokie batting order in the final two frames, striking out all six hitters.

"We changed [our signs], and it pretty much worked," Faessler said. "They weren't as keen on what we were about to do. With Harry pitching, they were really on their toes, wondering what was coming next. So they were definitely trying to get anything they could, and see where the ball was going to be."

With the A-10 regular season championship on the line, Sortino opted to throw Henderson in both games of the double header instead of the usual format, in which Henderson throws in game one and sophomore Carrie Ielfries in game two.

Although it was a difficult decision, the results payed tremendous dividends for the Minutewomen, who captured both games on the laurels of Henderson's dominating pitching. The Commack, N.Y. native retired 20 of 21 batters during her game-one shut out, and followed with 17 strikeouts in game two, raising her season total to 373.

Despite all sign-stealing attempts, Henderson had little trouble toying with the Virginia Tech lineup. In fact, the tactic surprised neither her nor her coach.

"A lot of people try to steal signs from us," Sortino said. "I can keep changing them from inning to inning. One of their kids was trying to eye the glove of our catcher and it almost cost her the at-bat."

As far as sportsmanship is concerned, Sortino didn't feel that there was anything wrong with Thomas's decision to scrape and claw for an edge against Henderson. She did, however, criticize the move from a softball standpoint.

"I'm not a proponent of that, but hey, if they want to do it, it's fine with me," she said. "I, personally, don't think it's a good idea — having hitters try to predetermine where the ball is going to go — because it's much better for a hitter to react to seeing the ball. A lot of the time, pitchers miss."

While some of the UMass attention was geared toward preventing the sign-stealing, Henderson decided (during the game one) that she would not let it alter the manner in which she pitched. Sortino believes that, if anything, it was a refreshing challenge for her star pitcher.

"She and I have the same mindset," Sortino said of herself and Henderson. "You still have to beat us. Fine, you might know where the ball is coming, and every now and then you might guess right. But, you know what, you still have to hit the ball."

Oranges rain; SU downs UMass 8–6

By Sanford Appell
Collegian Staff

Despite the bitter taste of Friday night's 8–6 Syracuse win over the Massachusetts men's lacrosse team left in the mouths of the Minutemen, this defeat was purely fresh squeezed.

The Senior Night festivities were marred by supposed UMass fans continuing their ongoing tradition of launching oranges at 'Cuse players after the Orangemen gained a 6–3 lead in the fourth quarter.

The result of the barbarity was one and half minutes of man-up play for Syracuse, with one minute being attributed to unsportsmanlike conduct, and half a minute tacked on for a delay of game.

"This is so unfortunate for the game itself," Massachusetts coach Greg Cannella said. "It was such a good game to that point, and there is no need for that, it's clearly not first- class."

Syracuse attack Matt Cutia quickly cashed in the opportunity for a 7–3 edge, getting a wide open look of the net courtesy of an assist from Ryan Powell.

Powell was the ultimate playmaker on this evening, notching five assists to compliment one goal in the SU victory.

Adding insult to injury, several Orangemen players retaliated against the fans by hurling several of the navels back at the fans, without penalty.

Despite their actions, Cannella insists the fans have no one to blame but themselves.

"[Syracuse players] weren't here to cause trouble, they were here to play a lacrosse game, and the next thing they know they're getting hit with oranges," Cannella said.

"An official gets hit, I feel terrible for him. he gets hit right in the chest near the throat, it got really ugly."

Nearly six minutes after the first incident at the 7:05 mark, midfield Matt Calone broke through for an 8–3 stronghold, off another open look from the left side of the net.

From there on, UMass (4–8) played some of its best lacrosse of the season, even as fans continued to send several oranges onto the field every so often.

Mike Janowicz took a feed from Mike McKeefrey to cut the deficit to four, before John Madigan tossed in one of the most impressive tallies on the year.

Falling down in a heap in front of the cage, Madigan somehow was able to toss the ball past a stunned Rob Mulligan in net for SU from his knees.

COURTESY MEDIA RELATIONS

Chris Campolettano

Jeremy Guski would close out the game's scoring at 8–6, in desperation time for UMass after winding up from the right side, and firing a shot past Mulligan (11 saves).

"I was happy with our effort, especially the way they came back at the end," Cannella said. "At the same time it was disappointing that we missed out on a lot of opportunities."

Amongst the casualties was an 0-for-6 effort on extra-man opportunities for UMass, including a blank after a two- minute violation on Powell in the second quarter.

The game was highlighted most noticeably by a high level of physical play from both sides, and a tournament-like atmosphere including an estimated crowd of 5,000 on hand for the lone night contest of the year.

Despite all the positives, Syracuse will likely be wary about returning to Garber Field anytime soon because this is the second time rowdy spectators have taken extreme measures against them.

"UMass has become notorious for throwing oranges at us," Syracuse defenseman Josh Ruhle said. "This doesn't happen anywhere else to be quite honest, and it becomes very frustrating to say the least."

UMass will conclude its regular season at Brown on Saturday afternoon at 1 p.m.

Baseball drops three to Rhode Island

By Kathleen Ralls
Collegian Staff

It was a tough weekend to swallow. Facing a Rhode Island squad (19–25, 7–8 Atlantic 10) that was nine games below the .500 mark, the Massachusetts baseball team lost three games below a glorious sunny dome to drop to 22–16 and 10–5 in the A–10.

"We didn't compete all weekend," UMass Coach Mike Stone said. "We had opportunities and we left a lot of guys on base and in scoring position."

The Minutemen were looking to regroup with their strongest pitching trifecta in Bill Cooke, Travis Veracka and Bill Loonie after a tough loss to Boston College last Thursday. Cooke and Veracka, pacing themselves for their fourth straight weekend of complete game wins, failed to capitalize on the downtrodden Rhody team.

"Bill didn't have much juice and Travis dropped down in velocity," Coach Stone said.

In addition to the three losses, the Minutemen might have also lost second baseman Shaun Skeffington for the season. The junior, batting .319 with seven doubles and 29 stolen bases, broke his wrist while attempting to make a diving catch while covering first base.

In the first half of Saturday's doubleheader, UMass' leadoff batter Skeffington power-packed a pitch over the left center fence for his third home run of the year, forming a quick 1–0 lead. The Rams answered back in the second as Craig Kappelman's single drove in Jason Chansarian to tie it up.

The Minutemen responded to the challenge in the third inning when Bryan Mazzaferro singled and stole second. Catcher Chris Morgan then lifted a longball over the 370 ft. fence in right center to reclaim the lead at 3–1.

In the top of the fourth inning, the Rams took advantage of three UMass errors for three runs of their own. Morgan came through again in the bottom of the fifth when his sacrifice fly drove in Skeffington for his second of three RBI in the game. Rhode Island added a fourth run in the sixth, bringing the score to 6–4, URI.

The Minutemen produced one run the sixth when Gavin Clark drove in Nick Gorneault to bridge the gap to one. In the bottom of the seventh, Gorneault tallied a RBI of his own, swatting a sacrifice fly to center field to bring around Mazzaferro. But it proved inconsequential, as Rhode Island held on for the 7–6 win when Clark struck out to end the game.

Veracka took the mound in the second game, staving off the Rams for two and a third innings before Steve Lemieu cracked a double to centerfield, relaying McCarthy in to even up the score at 1–1. In the previous inning, Morgan had slapped a RBI single, driving in Gorneault for the first run of the game.

Two more quiet innings followed before Rhody broke the silence with three runs off three hits and one UMass error in the sixth inning, catapulting the score to 4–1. Veracka showed signs of struggle in the seventh inning when URI collaborated for three additional runs, a lead that would prove too much for the Minutemen despite three runs in the bottom of the seventh. Rhode Island's Jon Scullin hurled six innings to hold onto the 7–4 win.

In yesterday's 6–2 loss, UMass David Loonie lasted for one and a third inning before Craig Szado came on in relief. URI scored once in the first inning and tacked on three more runs in the second for a 4–0 lead, which they would hold onto until the fifth when they scored another run.

The Minutemen, who committed six errors and stranded nine baserunners, mustered one run in both the sixth and eighth innings.

"We have done some things to distract our goal," Coach Stone said. "We're not all set for the [A–10] tournament yet."

UMass falls to V–Tech at A–10's

By Paul Teves
Collegian Staff

PHILADELPHIA — The scene was one of disappointment, for the two seniors on the Massachusetts women's lacrosse team and for even junior and sophomores.

The disappointment lied in the fact that the Minutewomen lost 12–11 in the semifinal round of the Atlantic 10 tournament to Virginia Tech, despite having beaten Va. Tech earlier this season 8–7 at Ruth J. Totman Field.

The Hokies took care of business as they came back in the second part of the first half to close the UMass lead which was once 4–1, to tie the game 7–7 at the midway point. Virginia Tech then opened up an early lead in the second half on a pair of goals by Dawn Will, which gave the Hokies a lead they would never relinquish.

The Minutewomen would come back to within a goal four times but were unable to finish the job against the Hokies.

"It was a good competitive game between two really even teams. I think we just came up one goal short," UMass coach Francesca McClellan said. "I think we were slow to slide on their No. 15 (Will). We could have been a bit stronger defensively."

The Minutewomen also suffered due to some penalty calls that didn't go their way. They were out numbered in free position attempts nine to three, as well as suffering a 21–7 disadvantage in penalties called.

"We played a physical game and that's the risk we take, but we weren't as strong in the midfield as we needed to be though," McClellan said of the penalties called.

The Minutewomen jumped out to a 3–0 lead on the strength of two of Laura Korutz's goals and one by sophomore Rachel Ingraffea. The Hokies would come starting with the goal they scored at with 22:29 left to play in the first half, when Dawn Will scored the first of her five goals on the afternoon on an assist from Catherine Augustyn.

The Hokies used three goals off of free positions in the first half alone to climb back into the contest. By the half the Minutewomen were just hanging on to get to the break with the game tied.

After Will's two goals to open the half, the Minutewomen continued to battle back as they pulled to within one at 9–8, 10–9, 11–10 and 12–11.

"We created our opportunities on offense and we did some nice things, but it wasn't our best game. Did we need our best game to win today? It would appear so," McClellan said. "We did a lot of little things wrong that didn't cost us at the time but at the end it hurt us."

The game ended with in the same fashion it had carried on with throughout. The Minutewomen had the ball with 32 seconds remaining and the officials made a call to end the game, as she blew the whistle giving Virginia Tech possession and the contest.

Senior co-captain Laura Korutz finished her collegiate career with a great game by collecting five points on four goals and an assist. She definitely did her part in the losing effort for the Minutewomen. The other co-captain, and fellow senior Melissa Anderson also tallied a score in her final collegiate contest. Anderson's disappointment in the result was apparent in the tears she shed in her final lacrosse competition.

UMass also received solid contributions from Rachel Ingraffea and Stephanie Pavlick, who each scored two goals in the losing effort. Both Pavlick and Ingraffea scored a goal late to pull the game within one but the Minutewomen couldn't get that last goal.

The UMass killers for the Hokies included Will and her five tallies. Meagan O'Doherty and Karen Diacont each collected three points. O'Doherty had two goals and an assist in the win while Diacont scored two of her three goals on free positions.

Va. Tech went on to defeat Temple in the final game 8–7, to become the first ever A–10 Tournament Champion. Will who scored eight goals and an assist including the game winning goal in the final was best out for the tournament MVP by Temple's Nicole Ross. For the Minutewomen their season ends at 9–6, 4–2 in the conference, and on a disappointing note.

Candlelight vigil brings focus to slayings of Springfield women

By Jake Lilien
Collegian Staff

The brutal deaths of a dozen Springfield women over the course of the past nine years has received little attention in the press, despite the possibility that many or all of the women were victims of a single serial killer.

Cate Damon, a University Without Walls student, heard nothing about the case until she came across an article in the Valley Advocate. The article described the fight over a proposed memorial for the women, most of whom were from poor, racial minorities in Springfield. The memorial was to be placed in Mason Square Triangle, near a monument for veterans. Objections were raised that the women were not as honorable as those of men who had "died for their country."

Damon, and eight of her classmates in a women's studies course, held a vigil for the slain women yesterday near the Campus Pond. They lit a candle for each of the victims, announcing their names, as well as where they were from and the manner in which they died. Quotes from "Need: A Chorale for Black Woman Voices," a poem by Audre Lourde, were also read aloud.

Keri Tracy, a freshman English major, Aura Spivak, a freshman English and women's studies major, and Christina Query, a senior legal studies major, take part in last night's vigil.

The vigil was part of a project for a course entitled Critical Perspectives on Women's Studies, and the goal of their project was, in the words of Damon, "to come up with some kind of community activism to do as a group project." The group chose "violence against women" as their theme, but they were unable to develop a topic until reading the Advocate article.

"We wanted people to know about it," said Aura Spivac, a freshman double-majoring in women's studies and English. "We read about it, but why didn't it get covered? Their race, their gender, their class? How many people know about this?"

"Most other serial murders, you hear about nationally," said Ien Miller, a sophmore social thought and political economy (STPEC) major. "There was a possibility that at some point [the women] were involved with prostitution and

Fireworks may be cause of damaging dorm blaze

By Stacey Shackford
Collegian Staff

Fireworks may have been involved in a room fire that caused an estimated $10,000 worth of damage Friday evening.

Three fire trucks from the Amherst Fire Department responded shortly after 5 p.m. to a report of an electrical fire in a fourth-floor room at Coolidge Residence Hall.

A neighbor reported the fire after witnessing "bright flashes and loud popping" through a window which he thought to be coming from a stereo equipment, according to fire department records.

When the neighbor came to investigate, the resident had left the room, closing the door behind him.

Fire department investigation revealed that the room had contained a "quantity of fireworks, some of which had detonated."

The bedding and mattress on the lower berth of bunk beds had ignited, reports further stated. Flames were contained to the room, but smoke filled the entire fourth-floor hallway.

The room's sprinkler system was activated, resulting in extensive water damage in the hallway, down the stairs and elevator shafts.

UMass police detectives and the fire marshall also responded to the fire, and the matter is under investigation.

Two days later, shortly after 11 a.m. Sunday, the Amherst Fire Department was dispatched to the Southwest Horseshoe to extinguish a reported trash fire under a tent.

Upon arrival, fire fighters found a partially-extinguished fire involving three 30-gallon trash cans full of garbage.

The cause, according to fire department reports, was "careless disposal of charcoal briquettes from a cooking fire." There was no damage to the tent.

The Amherst Fire Department also extinguished a brush fire Friday afternoon on a one-half acre wooded area east of Thatcher Way, across from Johnson Residence Hall. The area of the fire was adjacent to "a foot path frequented by students," fire department reports stated. The cause of the fire has not been determined.

UMass Environmental Health and Safety responded to an additional five campfires this weekend near the Observatory.

School choice debated in Town Meeting

By Jill Carroll
Collegian Staff

AMHERST — Controversy once again flooded the Town Meeting floor last night as tempers flared over allowing school choice in Amherst and adding funding for a special needs coordinator.

While part of the discussion in the Amherst Regional Middle School auditorium included water usage, little was dry about the tempers flaring over the recent decision to allow students from other towns to attend Amherst-Pelham Regional Schools and adding $25,000 for a special needs director that would ensure the continuation of the Open Arms Project.

Approval of the Amherst-Pelham Regional School budget did not come without several Meeting members expressing their unhappines with the School Committee's decision to make Amherst-Pelham Regional middle and high schools open to students from towns outside the district.

By becoming part of school choice, the Regional Schools accept students from other districts and the children pay $5,000 each to attend the Regional Schools.

"By becoming part of school choice, the Regional Schools accept students from other districts and the children pay $5,000 each to attend the Regional Schools."

The move was made to bring money back into the district that is lost when children from the Amherst-Pelham Regional Schools go to charter schools, according to Regional School Committee Chairperson Nancy Ratner.

It costs the district $8,000 for each child who attends a charter school. There are currently 40 children going to the smaller charter schools which adds up to $320,000 lost.

But some Meeting members didn't think using school choice to balance the school budget was the right thing to do.

The Regional Schools shouldn't "take money that doesn't belong to us to enhance our own programs," said Otto Stein, a Meeting member. "I think the whole thing is sick."

But Ratner said the Amherst-Pelham Regional School district was not the first in the area to take the measure.

"A lot of [towns] around us have adopted school choice," Ratner said. "It was not a decision made lightly... It's in some ways a sharing of wealth with students in other schools."

"We did not do unto to others what was not done unto us," Myra Russ, chairperson of the Amherst School Committee said.

"I don't want to disparage the School Committee. I think they were driven to [the decision]," said Mary Wentworth, a Meeting member who said she did not support school choice.

"I don't want us to be [opposed to school choice] for selfish reasons," said Ilisa Campbell, a Meeting member, of comments made that school choice would hurt Amherst students. "[I'm] concerned about robbing our neighbors. Not robbing ourselves."

Russ was concerned that if the budget was not approved, it would be unfair to the 64 students who have already used school choice and have been admitted to the regional schools for next year through a lottery choosing system.

The budget has to be approved by three of the four towns that use the schools: Amherst, Pelham, Leverett and Shutesbury. With Amherst voting for it last night and Shutesbury already voting down the budget it is up to Pelham and Leverett as the deciding votes.

Debate sparked again over allocating $25,000 to Leisure Services to pay for a special needs coordinator to continue a project that pairs local high school students with individuals with special needs.

Following the approval of the Golf Course Fund, some Meeting members noted the contrast of funding part of a municipal golf course but not the special needs coordintor. The two items are in different sections of the budget.

Those opposed to the funding cited the future burden of being expected to fund a position that was funded by grants.

Emotional appeals were made by individuals with special needs or with relatives with special needs. It was approved.

Clinton encourages Russian effort to promote peace in Yugoslavia

By Terence Hunt
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Encouraging Russian peacemaking efforts, President Clinton said yesterday "we could have a bombing pause" in Yugoslavia if Slobodan Milosevic accepts NATO's demands for the withdrawal of his troops, the return of refugees and the deployment of an international security force.

Clinton said "there's plenty to talk about" within the terms set by NATO, which require "at least the beginning of withdrawal of Serb forces."

After a news conference, Clinton conferred with Russian envoy Viktor Chernomyrdin who reported on his talks with Milosevic last Friday. U.S. officials said before the meeting they had not heard anything from Milosevic that merits serious consideration. The president also was seeing the Rev. Jesse Jackson, home from a triumphant mission to Belgrade that won the release of three American servicemen held by Milosevic for more than a month.

Jackson criticized NATO for continuing its attacks after the soldiers' release. "I read NATO's response as the idolatry of might. I read it in some sense as the arrogance of power," he said on ABC's "Good Morning America."

Clinton spoke at a news conference with visiting Japanese Prime Minister Keizo Obuchi, whose country has contributed $200 million in assistance for Kosovo refugees. Obuchi said it was important for the international community to act in concert to find a political solution.

Administration leaders hastened to say Clinton was not softening the conditions for ending the airstrikes against Yugoslavia, which in 41 days have failed to break Milosevic's will.

"He did not say anything different," Secretary of State Madeleine Albright said. National Security Adviser Sandy Berger said, "It's exactly what we've said all along."

But the president's remarks seemed to highlight a longing for peace. He said he did not relish sending American forces into danger or order-

Columbine massacre changes face of media

NEW YORK (AP) — Local broadcasters are being urged to develop their own blueprints for covering big breaking stories like the Colorado massacre, with an emphasis on doing everything to avoid putting lives in danger.

News directors and general managers at more than 1,800 TV and radio stations will receive guidelines on how to handle these news emergencies from the Radio and Television News Directors Association.

The trade group hopes station operators develop plans or at least talk about what they would do if thrust into the national spotlight like Denver broadcasters were last week when two gunmen killed 13 people and themselves at Columbine High School.

"You can't plan for everything," Barbara Cochran, RTNDA president, said April 26. "You couldn't plan for a situation where kids hiding in a school would have cell phones. What you can do is have a dialogue in the newsrooms ahead of time."

Denver's KUSA-TV was criticized for broadcasting a cell phone conversation with a Columbine student before the massacre had ended. Critics said the caller's life could have been endangered if a gunman had heard where the student was hiding.

Broadcasters should always assume that a hostage taker or terrorist has access to their reporting, the suggested guidelines say. And stations should not divulge police tactics or SWAT team locations.

News directors should ask themselves whether the value of a live report on a hostage-taking situation "is really justifiable compared to the harm that could occur," the guidelines say. Seven Boston-area TV stations have agreed to voluntary rules for covering such situations, including no live footage of victims or SWAT teams. In several communities, such as Portland, Ore., and Tampa, Fla., broadcasters have reduced the use of news helicopters after talking with local police.

The RTNDA guidelines also call on stations to show care in interviewing family members of victims, ensuring that such conversations are "not simply conducted for the shock value of the emotions conveyed."

Av Westin, a former ABC executive and now a Freedom Forum fellow at the Media Studies Center in New York, is working with network and local broadcasters to develop a "fairness handbook" for television journalists.

Due by the end of this year, the handbook will deal with live coverage of events and questions surrounding hidden cameras, sourcing and other matters.

NEW YORK (AP) — Days after Howard Stern made wisecracks about the Columbine High School massacre, a Denver TV station pre-empted the shock jock's May 1 show for a special on the rampage.

"It's not disciplinary in any sense," said Marv Rockford, KCNC-TV's vice president and general manager. "I don't discipline Howard Stern. My responsibility here in terms of serving the community is to do what I think is appropriate at the moment to address the needs and concerns and questions in the community."

The Colorado Senate, meanwhile, passed a resolution April 28 condemning Stern for his comments.

The day after the shootings, Stern reportedly wondered aloud on his nationally syndicated radio show whether the gunmen tried "to have sex with any of the good-looking girls" who fled the school. The radio show was heard in Denver on KYPK-FM.

KYPK spokesman Joe Iaffoni said April 28 the station has not dropped the show but did run apologies for Stern's remarks. He also said the station told Stern's producers his comments "were inappropriate and insensitive to the community."

CBS, whose syndication arm Evemark distributes Stern's weekly television show, declined to comment.

The Colorado Senate censure, adopted 34-1, called on KXPX to drop Stern's show. The same resolution passed the Colorado House on April 27 by 57-4. Opponents objected on First Amendment grounds. In Seattle, KTWB-TV decided to drop Stern's Saturday night show in response to Stern's comments about the shootings in Colorado. Stern's daily, syndicated morning radio show is not broadcast in the Seattle market.

Elsewhere, Russ Johnson of KCMO in Kansas City, Mo., said he was fired for a remark made while discussing a threat at a local high school in the wake of Littleton. Johnson said he was saying what he would do as a parent deciding whether to send a child to the school.

"I would say, 'You're going to school.' I'd say, 'Here's a .357. If you have any problems, use this,'" he said.

ing bombing attacks that kill innocent civilians. Yet Clinton said that Milosevic has made diplomatic commitments before, only to break them. "You have to judge him by what he does," the president said.

Clinton said he was "quite encouraged" by the involvement of Russian President Boris Yeltsin and former Prime Minister Chernomyrdin in peacemaking diplomacy.

The president suggested NATO would be flexible on the makeup of an international security force so that it might include Russians and perhaps Ukrainians and others who have close ties to the Serbs. He said NATO "has to be a big part of it."

"Our conditions for ending the bombing are not complicated," Clinton said. "The Kosovars must be able to go home with security and self-government. Serbian forces must leave Kosovo. An international security force must deploy with the power not just to monitor but to protect all the people of Kosovo, Albanians and Serbs alike.

"Our air campaign cannot stop," the president said, "until Mr. Milosevic shows he is ready to end the nightmare for the people of Kosovo." Berger said Milosevic would not have to withdraw all his forces to escape the bombing, but "we have to have a verifiable demonstration" that his troops are leaving.

Clinton said the refugees would not return unless the Serb forces are withdrawn and until an international security force is in place.

"I am not trying to drag this out," Clinton said, "but I am determined to pursue our policy... to clearly and unambiguously reverse the policy of ethnic and religious cleansing."

In other developments:

- Air Force Maj. Gen. Charles Wald said it was possible an Air Force F-16 fighter that crashed in Serbia over the weekend was brought down by Serbian anti-aircraft weapons, rather than mechanical difficulties initially blamed. He said allied pilots have encountered more surface-to-air missiles over the past two or three days than earlier in the war.
- Wald announced that 400 Kosovo Albanian refugees are expected to arrive at Fort Dix, N.J., tomorrow, followed by another 400 on Friday. They are to be taken in by private families.
- Pentagon spokesman Kenneth Bacon said 120 members of the 939th Rescue Wing, an Air Force Reserve unit based in Portland, Ore., are being called to active duty to supplement the combat search and rescue forces operating in the Balkans. Their call-up brings to 2,236 the number of reservists ordered to active duty for the Balkans.

drugs, but nothing is definite. Is that the reason that their deaths should be any less honorable than these veterans?

"What is important," she added, "is the connection between these murders and violence against women."

The bodies of the women, all of them strangled and many of them nude and raped, were discovered in Springfield from Dec. 26, 1990 to Feb. 19, 1998. A 32-year-old Springfield native by the name of Alfred Gaynor has been arraigned in the deaths of four of the women, although some believe that one or more copycat killers could have been involved.

According to Keri Tracy, a freshman English major, the Springfield memorial will be placed at an alternate site, possibly on St. James Avenue.

Consumer confidence on the upswing

By Alice Ann Love
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Showing confidence in the economy's strength, Americans continue to spend as fast as their incomes are growing. They are even dipping into savings.

Personal income increased a seasonally adjusted 0.4 percent in March, following slightly smaller increases in January and February, the Commerce Department reported Monday.

And consumers matched that income growth with a 0.4 percent rise in spending, more moderate than February's 0.8 percent rise but nevertheless extending the increase streak to eight months. Overall, spending has outpaced income growth, leaving the nation's personal savings rate — savings as a percentage of after-tax income — at a record low of minus 0.6 percent in March.

Although analysts are vigilant for signs of an economic slowdown, "The fact that consumers are willing to bring the savings rate into the negative territory indicates that they're not concerned about their income and jobs," said economist Sung Won Sohn, of Wells Fargo & Co. in Minneapolis.

Investors pushed the Dow Jones average of industrial stocks up 226 points yesterday to close for the first time above 11,000-points — just over a month after breaking the once-unthinkable 10,000-point mark.

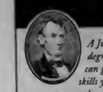
Avid consumer spending helped keep the U.S. economy growing at a robust 4.5 percent annual rate during the first three months of this year, despite analysts' expectations that overseas economic turmoil would take more of a toll.

Low interest and mortgage rates have also fueled spending on construction projects, which rose 0.5 percent in March, despite a decline in commercial building, the department said in a separate report today. That came on top of four previous months of increases, including a big 2 percent jump in February.

Construction spending for the first three months of 1999 was 10 percent higher than in the same period last year.

Meanwhile, the National Association of Purchasing Management said in a third report released yesterday that the nation's manufacturing sector continued to expand for the third straight month in April. But the growth was less robust than in the previous month.

That, combined with more moderate spending growth, could be among the first signs of an expected economic slowdown, some analysts speculated.



"This situation is not sustainable in the long run," said Gordon Richards, an economist with the National Association of Manufacturers.

However, with the nation's unemployment rate holding near a 29-year low, demand for labor is strong and wages have continued to rise — by 0.3 percent in March.

Continuing solid stock market gains are also lining many people's pockets. Interest and dividend income rose in March, along with rental incomes and business owners' incomes.

Regulating your gas

A national plan for continuing to reduce vehicle tailpipe emissions was defended by Bill Clinton in his weekly radio address. As would be expected, the oil industry claims that adding new regulations not only will raise costs for vehicles themselves but for gasoline as well.

Clinton stated that "The proposal would achieve a dramatic reduction in air pollution for the 21st century, and it would do so in the most cost–effective and flexible ways." as reported in The New York Times.

The new rules will include categorizing sport utility vehicles as cars in terms of emission standards for the first time in 2009. This is due in large part because these vehicles are no longer used primarily for recreation, but for daily commuting. These vehicles produce approximately three times as much pollutants as passenger cars, a fact which has agitated environmentalists.

Jason Weisenbach

The rules would also force oil companies to reduce sulfur in their gasoline, a main cause of pollutants emitted from the vehicles. The auto industry supports this provision strongly because reducing gasoline pollutants allows the vehicles produced to have less expensive emissions control equipment.

However, the oil industry claims that forcing them to refine gasoline more would unnecessarily raise the price of gasoline for everyone, and the fact is that rural areas have no pollution problems. The industry–proposed gasoline standards would only take effect in highly polluted areas, including Eastern states and California.

The new rules, though, will go into effect regardless of what the oil industry wants, due to a provision giving the Clinton Administration discretion in dealing with the dilemma. The only way the oil industry can change the rules to their plan is if Congress changes it.

The oil industry, it seems, calculates pollution only based on the air quality in certain places and not globally. However, environmentalists, who pushed for the measure, realize that allowing rural areas to pollute more than larger areas still allows for more pollutants in the atmosphere, many of which blow with the wind into other areas.

It is very likely that gasoline prices would rise, though. This perhaps is the only argument the oil companies have that appeals to the average consumer besides an increase of a few hundred dollars in new car prices. However, if someone can afford a new car, then that person should be able to pay an extra few hundred dollars.

Furthermore, it is well known that the United States has some of the lowest gasoline prices in the world and that even adding an additional dime or quarter per gallon will not even match the prices in many other countries.

I feel that the oil industry, as well as the auto industry, has consistently fought against increasing emissions standards out of the fear of losing profit due to the extra investments they have to put into their products. However, as raising prices shows, much of this cost is immediately passed to the consumer, thus eliminating much of the capital losses.

This provision certainly is not the end in emissions standards. And, there is no guarantee that by 2009, all of the necessary emissions components and refined gasoline will be ready for sale. As we have seen with past low–emissions laws passed in states like California, the two industries have a history with pushing back the dates for years, if they even follow them at all.

I feel that the two industries, with all of the capital they both possess, could refine their vehicles and gasoline even further than the provisions suggest. Even if they claim that they do not have the technology to do it now, they certainly have the money to invest in our environment.

I am sure that the two industries and their most powerful leaders realize that the longer they put off adding new technologies into their products, the more profit they can make now, and the more money they can receive now. I think we can all agree that the oil industry, especially, has always looked for profit before the effects of its product.

One ultimate solution to the problem would be to eliminate gasoline–based vehicles altogether, with such products as electric cars or natural gas–based cars. This would solve the problem of emissions to a point, but would it appeal to the consumer and would it cost the same?

It certainly will never cost the same as long as the oil industry and its very powerful lobby group have an interest in Congress. However, I do not feel that totally outlawing gasoline cars would be in the best interest of all consumers or Americans.

As much as I value the environment, I still feel that allowing older cars to exist is necessary. I do not want to see this country disallow the use of cars older than 10 years, like a few countries have done now. This would outlaw the use of classic automobiles that I feel should be allowed on the streets.

Regardless of how much these older cars pollute, as years go by, they continually dwindle in number to the point of rarity. I do not feel that such a small number of these highly polluting cars should disappear. However, I do feel that creating stricter emissions standards on new vehicles, especially larger ones like sport utilities, will eventually cut the vehicle pollutants down. As long as we allow a grandfather clause for older vehicles, which are easier to afford for those with a lower income, I feel that building newer less–polluting vehicles far outweighs the costs of a further polluted environment, as we do not have the technology to purify it once it is damaged.

Days of Our Lives

Nobody noticed, but "Give Your Car A Break Week" was a few weeks ago. In a bold counter–programming move, it was also "Drive Safe To Work Week."

I haven't seen such a daring paradox of ideas since "Touch A Stranger Day" happened during "Whup–Ass Week" a few years ago. I know all hell broke loose at my high school, but the privileged boys of LaSalle have so much pent up aggression after listening to Rage Against the Machine in their Jeeps, most people just let it go.

Mike Messaros

Anyway, feeling a little saucy, I decided to neither give my car a break nor drive safely to work. Or anywhere, for that matter. I had my car do laundry and then make me a sandwich (which I only ate only a few bites of before spitting out. "I said spicy mustard, dammit!"). I drove a good three miles over the speed limit and signalled 20 feet before a turn, instead of the recommended 30 feet. I was wild and out of control, a primal beast on the streets of Amherst; I even gave one cop the finger. And if his back hadn't been turned to me, I'm sure there would have been quite a hootenanny of a discussion.

But after that I had to slow down. My body just couldn't take all that excitement. But then I found out all of the great days and weeks that no one knows about. I'm never going to rest again.

I didn't know that it was so easy to just name a day. I've heard that it all started with Secretary's Day and kind of snowballed from there. At least that's what Howard Zinn said in The People's History of the United States, but I've always thought that Zinn had a bone to pick with secretaries for some reason.

But if you look closely enough in the Hallmark catalogue you can find cards for many other "holidays" you never knew existed. Some "holidays" you might want to mark on you calender:

Feb. 26 — "Prudencio Gomez Jr. Day Of Appreciation"
The Week of March 11 — "Epsolm Salt Week"
April 22 — "Vodka Day"
June 24 — "Hold It In Day"
July 9 — "WalMart's Day Of Laughing At The Stores They Put Out Of Business"
The Week of July 14 — "Deer Tick Awareness Week"
Aug. 25 — "Hot Chicks Day"
Aug. 26 — "Not Hot Chicks Day" (As in, it's not hot chicks day, not that the chicks aren't hot.)
The Week of Sept. 13 — "Days of Thunder!"
Nov. 7 — "Get To Know Your Sinuses Day, sponsored by Vicks Vap–O–Rub"
Dec. 17 — "Get To Know Your Local Creepy Old Guy Day."

I personally look forward to "Deer Tick Awareness Week" the most. When I was a kid, the carnival used to come to my town, filled with the most wondrous sights, sounds and smells. There were tick races, free bug spray samples and Punchy The Monkey Who Hates Ticks. Then there were always the gang fights.

Now the "holiday" I seem to celebrate most is "Writer's Block Day." The last time I celebrated that was on May 3, when I sat down in front of a computer and said "I have to write my column," and all I could smell was this cheesy "Express–Yo–Self" chap stick that just reeked of espresso. I'm still smelling that stuff. And after about six hours of sitting down here, all I could come up with "Punchy The Monkey Who Hates Ticks." Great going, Mike.

> "The thing is, writing is a bear. And as a Maine yokel once told me, 'Sometimes you eat the bear and sometimes the bear eats you.'"

The thing is, writing is a bear. And as a Maine yokel once told me, "Sometimes you eat the bear and sometimes the bear eats you." But she also told me that the guy we bought lobsters from on that warm August day two summers ago had a wolverine in a box and answered to "The Captain." He didn't on either count. But regardless of that, consider me eaten.

Anyway, my plan right now is to take a nap and maybe eat some Oreos. And by the way, you'll never get back the few minutes you just spent reading this. Sorry.

Seven deadly sins

Since my 16th birthday, I had been waiting to turn 21. My childhood days were long over, and I was eager to become an adult and enjoy all the carnal pleasures that I envisioned would accompany it. At the time when teenagers are being introduced to dating, parties and increasing freedom, I was impatient to grow up, as many kids are.

The next five years passed faster than I expected, during which I experienced friendships, love and life. I fumbled through first sexual experiences and socially difficult situations, emerging a stronger, wiser person.

Last month I celebrated my 21st birthday. I went out for my first legal night of drinking with my friends and proceeded to get very drunk. The next morning I woke up with a nauseous stomach and a severe headache, my wallet considerably lighter. I thought, "Is this all I have to look forward to for the next 50 years?"

Strangely enough, I thought of the movie Seven starring heartthrob Brad Pitt, who investigates crimes related to the seven deadly sins of mankind: greed, sloth, lust, vanity, gluttony, murder and envy. I concluded from my experiences that there are also seven deadly sins of turning 21.

After a few nights of going to bars or clubs so that you can flaunt your ID, the newly turned 21–year–old discovers that it is a lot more expensive to go out and drink. This Inspires greed because the value of money is constantly a consideration. People deal with greed differently. Some compensate by rarely going out, others frequent bars but tip poorly, and everyone wishes that money grew on trees.

It is a common ploy to try attracting members of the opposite sex to buy drinks or pay an admission price. The natural opposition to working more hours for extra cash is a perfect example of sloth, even at the expente of kissing someone at the end of the night for buying you a few drinks.

Alcohol lowers inhibitions and allows the deadly sin of lust to be in the forefront. The AIDS scare has caused Americans to have safer sex, but the average adult still has a high number of partners.

> "Gluttony is most obvious, I believe, in a bar scene. Newly turned 21–year–olds are notorious for... binge drinking."
> Christine Coco

To attract mates, people try to look as attractive as possible. Women meticulously apply cosmetics and perfumes so that they can bat heavily mascarаed–eyes at gelled–hair men. Vanity has a strong presence in bars and adult establishments.

Gluttony is most obvious, I believe, in a bar scene. Newly turned 21–year–olds are notorious for the ability to consume large quantities of alcohol in one sitting, known as binge drinking. The last call that is announced at 12:30 a.m. almost brings on waves of panic as people scramble to make their final drink orders and as the guy falling off his stool next to you leans over and slurs, "You know, it's alcohol abuse not to finish your drink." You barely stifle a laugh.

I do not mean to make light of alcoholism or the thousands of Americans who die yearly from the disease. I see it as the murder of oneself, a form of suicide. My eyes were opened after I turned 21 and began frequenting bars, because I got to know the daily regulars and witnessed the fact that over–indulgence can kill.

Perhaps you will remember this column and will relate it to fellow co–workers since the newly established adult is most likely financially independent from his or her parents and is desperate to succeed in the workplace. America in general is a land of competition, and there is always someone better off than you, which breeds envy of those people who are ahead of you.

Based upon my perceptions, this is a more realistic expectation for minors of life after 21, and a reminder for adults of the dangers of the seven deadly sins: greed, sloth, lust, vanity, gluttony, murder and envy.

Christine Coco is a UMass student.

Ben Folds Five slows down a bit

By Stacey Shackford

THE UNAUTHORIZED BIOGRAPHY OF REINHOLD MESSNER
Ben Folds Five
Caroline Records

When I first heard the this album I was like, "Duuude, this isn't at all like 'Underground'." Frankly, I was a little disappointed. I had heard the happy–dappy poppy radio single "Army" and was expecting more of the same wacky, energetic piano rock that had driven the band's last two albums and four years worth of spectacular live shows.

But that is not exactly the case on this album. The first track, "Narcolepsy," is intense — and complex... and long. It starts out with a lonely piano solo. Then enter raging drums and bass, and the full sound of a cello, flufelhorn and a few violins. The song continues in that vein for a full minute before Ben Folds' sweet lyrics drift in and out of a multi–layered throbbing background instrumental banter.

Track two, "Don't Change Your Plans," is somewhat slow and a little sad. "Sometimes I get the feeling / that I won't be on this planet / for very long," it begins. "Oh my." I thought to myself. "How blue!" I soon realized, however, that I've grown up quite a bit since "Underground" and apparently, so has Ben Folds Five.

Upon further inspection, I began to appreciate the band's mature new sound. I realized, for instance, that "Narcolepsy" is genius. The music and lyrics couldn't be more perfectly suited for each other. And tracks three and four, "Mess" and "Magic" are really quite beautiful. "Magic" is especially impressive. Written by drummer Darren Jessee, the song is a bit of a departure. It has, as one might expect, some excellent drum, cymbal and gong action, as well as pronounced violin and cello segments which sound oh–so– nice for this sad love/death ballad.

The Unauthorized Biography of Reinhold Messner is less a biography of Messner (who, by the way, was the first man to climb Mount Everest without oxygen — a fact the band swears it was unaware of when they titled the album) and more an autobiography of three boys who have spent too much time on the road and in the studio, suddenly becoming extremely introspective.

This is reflected directly in a number of the songs, including the whimsical "Your Redneck Past" and the disorienting "Your Most Valuable Possession," which includes a voice–mail message from Folds' father, worried about his son's well–being.

There is a dark side to Messner. In recent interviews, Folds has even gone so far as to say that he wishes he could quit the band. Don't worry, he goes on to say he won't quit because he's quit everything else in life and the band's all he's got left.

This new "philosophy" (pun intended) has also spilled over into recent live performances. An April 25 Springfield College show was downright somber. The band seemed almost transformed. I remember way as a musical parallel to the struggles encompassing innate poverty and urban angst.

Yet today, hip–hop music has primarily been forced above its original rebelliousness and begun widely secreting messages of boisterous materialism. And as an industrial megalith, it has become increasingly difficult for its artists to emanate a gleeful social rage that once came naturally.

Consequently, pessimistic purists believe that hip–hop is heading for an iceberg and soon its exterior will be sunk by the lucrative forces of commercial commodification. But while companies such as Sprite and Bad Boy Records compose this detrimental gravitational

David Katzoff

How big is hip–hop? Besides being the nations best–selling sound, it has slowly emerged as a recognizable attache in the spectrum of mainstream American society. Recently the U.S. Postal Service decided to acknowledge hip–hop via a series of stamps commemorating the past century. More adamantly than ever, rap music is being sculpted by the media industry as a form of entertainment once ignored, but now increasingly adored.

But before we "push the envelope too far, it is important to evaluate whether this type of mass–exposure will affect its aura and authenticity.

Since its culmination in the mid–70s, hip–hop has thrived by procreating rebellious youthful expression. Over the years, rap artists, has battled politicians, critics, skeptics and ministers by exoting

THE POISONWOOD BIBLE
Barbara Kingsolver
HarperFlamingo Publishers

ANOTHER AFRICA
Photographs by Robert Lyons
Text by Chinua Achebe
Anchor Books

Representing Africa is like wandering on a mine field — fall into Western prejudices, or romantic gushing, and boom!, the work becomes one more throwaway Western fantasy. Luckily, Barbara Kingsolver's The Poisonwood Bible and Robert Lyons' Another Africa approach the substantial misconceptions about the second largest continent skillfully, and avoid this mine field.

Known for novels intimately exploring personal and emotional territory, such as The Bean Trees, Kinsolver crosses the Atlantic with the ragged baggage of family disfunction and evangelical blindness in The Poisonwood Bible. It tells the story of the Price family, which goes to live in the Belgian Congo in 1959 at the insistence of their father, a zealous Baptist minister bent on the salvation of the "heathen." Told through the alternating perspectives of Orleanna, the mother, and her four daughters, Kingsolver prisms American perspectives on a colony ready to erupt.

Kingsolver succeeds in these early pages because of her remarkable ability to create believable voices. From the adult–mimicking voices of 5–year–old Ruth May to the muted genius of the mentally incapacitated Adah, the cultural confusion of the Price family in a foreign land is masterfully woven.

The Poisonwood Bible wisely avoids generalizing about Africa in the early pages, instead placing the characters in the foreground. A family of American Baptists in 1959 can no more understand Congolese culture under imperialism than they can understand how a spaceship works. And the setting seems as indescribable as the moon for these missionaries.

As the novel progresses, the father, Nathan Price, begins to become foreign as well. Incensed that the Congolese will not give up their Gods of generations for Jesus, we see through the eyes of his daughters a religious insanity developing. His refusal to bend at all to the culture, and his ignorant imposition of western values, are a clever personal representation of imperialism as a whole.

Ironically, it is only when The Poisonwood Bible bluntly tries to take on the wrongs of imperialism that it goes off track. It becomes preachy, and I felt like the choir — kingsolver does fine by simply letting the reader figure out what wrongs Africa has had to endure. However, the novel as a whole does an excellent job of melding individual stories with a continent generally ignored in literature.

Fortunately, Robert Lyons did not ignore anything in the photographs of Another Africa. From an image of two fish crossed in a dusty marketplace to the determined expression of a young Ghanaian girl, Lyons takes photographs of Africa contrasting to the bloody images of revolution that predominate in the media. His color is exquisite, and unlike many photographers, important — what neon on a rainy night is to sadness, Lyons' color is to African landscape in his lens.

What is refreshing about the photography is that it does not make the generalizations that a National Geographic or a newspaper photograph would make. There are women reading, men selling apples in a market, flowers scattered in a muddy street — these are tiny pieces of a world most Americans do not understand.

"It would be presumptuous to think that the images in this book could define the place," says Robert Lyons in a note at the end of the book. But Robert Lyons defines instead a moment with subtlety, color, and understanding.

Complimenting the photographs well are seven poems and an essay by former UMass professor and renowned African author Chinua Achebe. Known for his novel Things Fall Apart, Achebe narrows his focus into poems that include the hopelessness, but also the promise, of contemporary African culture.

"One day," writes Achebe, "notes sprouting green incantations every where [will] free the world from barmattan death... But for me... no hurricane will hit my sky — and no song of deliverance."

A celebration of history and culture

By Emily Trask
Collegian Staff

In celebration of the first major performance highlighting Philippine culture in the Pioneer Valley, the Folkorico Filipino Dance Company of New York danced their way into the hearts of the audience at the University of Massachusetts' Bowker Auditorium on Sunday.

Introductory remarks were made by Consul General of the Philippines Cecilia Rebong, who was visiting from New York City to join in celebrating the special occasion. Before the concert, Rebong provided a brief overview of the history of the Philippines.

"Culture is the manifestation of a people's soul," she said. Rebong explained that there is a history of "development through colonization" that has shaped the Philippines.

Though an independent country today, the Philippines have in the past been under control of Spain and the United States. This complicated history has resulted in a fusion of cultures.

Rebong's comments were an important key to understanding the themes of the dance concert which were an obvious blend of Spanish and Asian cultures.

The concert was divided up into four sections that were used to demonstrate Filipino life, history, myths and culture. Their dedication to presenting the indigenous history of the Philippines was accomplished — to the delight of the audience — through upbeat tempos, elaborate and colorful costumes, and intricate dances and acrobatics that were all pulled together with an infectious excitement that exuded from the dancers.

The final number was contained in a carnival-like atmosphere, that fittingly is said to take place in May when pilgrims travel to the hills of Antipolo, near Manila. This grand finale used traditional Filipino dances and vividly colorful costumes. The highlights of this performance were the audience participation, which consisted of singing and clapping, the use of bamboo poles as balancing beams and as rhythmic instruments, and the balancing of lighted candles on the heads and bodies of the dancers.

The entire performance was an extremely enjoyable experience that brilliantly displayed the melding of different cultures and how it has shaped a people.

force, beneath the surface a holistic hip-hop culture thrives. We call this the underground.

Somewhere amidst the abyss of confusion and exposure, a tight-knit civilization has been forming. With technology like the Internet, networking has become a primary source for independent labels, magazines, companies and individuals to establish themselves as separate entities from the confusious world of recognized rap. Similar to the '70s, grassroots events like DJ battles, spoken word sessions, graffiti shows and open mic nights have attracted a slew of energetic heads eager to partake in the realness of organic hip-hop.

The Pioneer Valley has witnessed this on numerous occasions all year long. (Who needs the Hard Knock Life tour?) Ironically however, there is a direct correlation between hip-hops success and a pulsating underground scene. So as the infiltration ensues, the community of subterranean hip-hop culture will continue to initiate itself as a valuable provider of delectable alternative flavor. Stamps or no stamps we are not going anywhere, or in the words of Premier "we like roaches baby, never dying always living."

Keep those ears low to the ground and sift through that abyss. Stay tuned...

time of 6:34.8, five seconds better than Syracuse's time of 6:39.4 along the 2000-meter course.

The boat consisted of Sara Pragluski, Taniana Sarafile, Sarah Pullman, Verena Loch, Michelle Archer, Nayla Leslie, Amy Lawless, Francesa Beaudoin and Heather Walker.

The other victorious boat, the varsity four, crossed the finish line in 7:35.6. Syracuse's boat finished in 7:39.3.

Unfortunately, the junior varsity eight couldn't repeat the performance of their varsity counterparts, as they fell to the Orangewomen.

The margin of victory for Syracuse was similar to the other two races as this one ended with a four- second difference. Syracuse won in 6:46.4, with UMass rowing a 6:50.

But for now, all the Minutewomen can do is prepare as if the team is going to receive a bid. Their lone remaining race against Dartmouth and Cornell has been called off, so there is nothing to do except wait and prepare. It should prove to be an interesting wait as the team's destiny is ultimately out of their hands.

"We know we're going to get selected as an eight squad, but we want to go as a team like we did last year," Dietz said. "It's a bogus format that we're on with the NCAA and regional selection. It's way too subjective."

With their past success and strong showings recently, the Minutewomen hope the selection committee will consider them worthy of a team bid. If so, the team should be at full speed with almost a full month to prepare.

But as for now, Dietz is starting to see the team come together at crunch time.

"As the year progresses, the team solidifies, and the cream rises to the top," he said.

es was over 35 feet better than the throw of Thomas Hicks of the University of Rhode Island. Those two first-place finishes were good enough to earn him a spot on the All-Conference team.

COURTESY MEDIA RELATIONS
B.J. Cardoza

Cardoza's second place in the discus was accompanied by another second place in the hammer throw, which was the result of a mark of 196-feet-1-inch.

Aside from Morency and Cardoza, sophomore Brendan Sullivan also stood out at the meet. Sullivan took first place in the 3,000m steeplechase with a time of 9:28.26 and second place in the 5,000m with a time of 15:32.74. Both of those times put him alongside teammate Morency as the only UMass athletes to make the All-Conference team.

These terrific performances from Morency, Cardoza and Sullivan were the catalysts of another great UMass outing. All year long this team has been steadily improving, building upon each successive meet and coming up big when it has been necessary.

Morency has definitely led the way, as he has dominated every meet, but other players have followed suit and come up with great finishes as well. It seems as though every week a new player is stepping up and contributing to the cause.

"It was for the pregnant. It was for the coaching staff. We're happy for Julie. It is a great way to end a great career at UMass," she said.

LaFreniere could not speak highly enough of all the athletes.

"They had a super attitude. All of them were very competitive," she said.

In the end, however, Irish may have summed up the weekend the best.

Hamilton may go pro

STORRS, Conn. (AP) — All-America forward Richard Hamilton, who led Connecticut to its first national championship in March, reportedly will enter the NBA draft.

ESPN reported yesterday that Hamilton will announce at a news conference at 3 p.m. today that he will leave the school. Tim Tolokan, UConn's sports information director, would not confirm the report, but said a news conference has been scheduled for Gampel Pavilion.

The 6-foot-6 swingman was the heart of the Huskies' national championship team. He averaged 19.7 points a game and became the second highest scorer in school history with 2,036 points. Hamilton was an All-American and co-Player of the Year in the Big East Conference, joining Patrick Ewing and Chris Mullin as the only two-time winners of that award.

Hamilton flirted with the idea of turning pro before his junior season, but was lured back to campus by the prospect of making a run at the national title.

UConn's other star, guard Khalid El-Amin, said last month he would return to Storrs for his junior season.

San Francisco's Kent hits for the cycle

PITTSBURGH (AP) — Jeff Kent hit for the cycle in his first four at-bats against Pittsburgh last night, becoming the first San Francisco Giants player to do so since Robby Thompson on April 22, 1991.

Kent is the 19th player in Giants' history to hit a single, double, triple and homer in the same game — something Giants star Barry Bonds has never done.

Kent singled in the first inning before hitting a three-run homer in the third for his first RBIs since April 20. He tripled to center field in the fifth and doubled down the left-field line in the seventh.

His first three at-bats came against Pirates starter Chris Peters and the double came off Marc Wilkins.

Kent is only the second player to hit for the cycle since Three Rivers Stadium opened in July 1970. Joe Torre, now the New York Yankees' manager, hit for the cycle on June 27, 1973 for the St. Louis Cardinals.

The last player to hit for the cycle was Colorado's Neifi Perez who did it last July 25 against St. Louis.

Pennsylvania native has proved to be just as versatile in the field. George began her UMass career as a designated hitter before moving to shortstop in her junior campaign. She quickly adapted to her new role, starting there for 46 of the 47 games she appeared in.

In her senior year, George was once again called upon to play a different role on the squad. George's new jungle is the green expanse of left field, where she has compiled a fielding percentage of .963. That stat is even more impressive considering the position is new to her, but George writes it off as merely doing what the team asks of her.

"I wasn't really sure how things were going to pan out in the end," George said. "The best thing for me was to just keep working hard every day at practice. Especially in the beginning. Give a good effort all the time. If you do that things will play out themselves."

"I feel comfortable anywhere. I feel I can play the role I am asked to play," added George. "In the beginning it was a little tricky. That transition was hard. I worked on it over the summer and I broke that. Now I feel I can get a jump on the ball."

Batters beware, because when George is in her jungle your ball will swallowed up.

As her UMass career begins to wind down, George sees it as her duty to pass along her experiences to a predominantly younger team. The seniors on the team have been places that the underclassmen only dream of reaching. As a co-captain and a team leader, George prepares to lead her team into the post-season.

"You can show them the way," George said. "You take what you have learned and kind of pass it on to them. And then they can look at you and do an even better job. Being a co-captain is the easy part when you have younger players who have such a great attitude."

■ baseball

for the Minutemen, the pair has seen the majority of their time on the weekends, and are not likely to figure in the decision this afternoon. Instead, UMass will probably face either Jason Kiser (4-2, 4.38 earned run average). Dave Fields (3-3, 5.73 ERA) or Jeff Reardon (3-3, 5.73 ERA).

Offensively, the Saints have five starters batting over .300, and are led by Todd Donovan and Ryan Finn. Donovan leads the team with a .392 average, while Finn is hitting .358 to go along with nine home runs and 42 runs batted in.

On the UMass side of things, senior Aaron Braunstein sports a .346 average and has 10 long balls and 43 RBI this year. Fellow classmate Brian Samela has a .322 mark to go along with a team-leading 15 doubles. Other top hitters for the Minutemen include senior Bryan Mazzaferro, redshirt freshman Scott Anderson and freshman Chris Morgan.

In addition, freshman Mike Kulak carries a .365 average into today's game, but has missed the last four contests because of a strained hamstring. Junior Kevin O'Connell and sophomore Nick Gorneault have also been hot as of late for UMass.

BRIAN MCDERMOTT/ COLLEGIAN

Bryan Mazzaferro and the Massachusetts baseball team will travel to Loudonville, N.Y. this afternoon to square off with Siena College.

Tragedy strikes NHL as Chiasson dies in crash

By Tom Foreman Jr.
Associated Press Writer

RALEIGH, N.C. — Carolina Hurricanes defenseman Steve Chiasson was killed early yesterday when his pickup truck overturned hours after his team was eliminated from the playoffs in Boston. Chiasson, a 32-year-old native of Barrie, Ontario, died about 4:15 a.m. in the accident in north Raleigh, Trooper K.L. Horn of the State Highway Patrol said.

"This is a tragedy that is impossible to put into words," said Jim Rutherford, the Hurricanes' president and general manager.

"When a young life ends prematurely, when a young family loses a husband and a father, words cannot begin to express our sorrow," NHL commissioner Gary Bettman said in a statement.

Horn said Chiasson was thrown from the pickup after it ran off the road and flipped. Highway Patrol Sgt. Jeff Winstead said evidence at the scene and interviews suggested Chiasson might have been drinking.

Hurricanes spokesman Chris Brown said the team's charter arrived at Raleigh-Durham International Airport about 1 a.m. The players got in their vehicles at the airport and left.

Brown said beer was among the beverages served on the plane, but he didn't know if Chiasson had any alcohol.

The Hurricanes lost 2-0 to Boston in Game 6. On Friday night, Chiasson scored the first goal in a 4-3 double-overtime loss to the Bruins.

"When you work together and been in our environment, you have a family," coach Paul Maurice said at a news conference. "There's no other way to put it, and we lost a member of our family."

Chiasson spent eight years with the Detroit Red Wings, was traded to the Calgary Flames in 1994 and in 1997 to what then was the Hartford Whalers.

He was drafted by Detroit in 1985 and played his first NHL game the following year. In 1988-89, he led all Red Wings' defensemen with 47 points.

In 1989-90, he scored a career-high 14 goals and again led all Detroit defensemen in scoring with 42 points.

The Detroit team issued a statement saying, "Steve was a member of the Red Wings' family for several years and continued to be a close friend to individual players and staff, as well as the organization. We are deeply saddened by this tragic loss. Our thoughts and prayers are with Steve's family."

Chiasson played in his first NHL All-Star game in 1993. At Calgary, he was rated second among Flames' defensemen in scoring in 1995-96 with 33 points and notched his 300th NHL career point on Nov. 29, 1995.

Chiasson is survived by his wife, Susan, two sons and a daughter.

TAURUS (April 20–May 20) — One or two friends are sure to add a little extra pressure today when you are on the verge of a major decision. Make up your own mind!

GEMINI (May 21–June 20) — Consistency will tell the tale today, and if you can progress without making any kind of careless mistakes, you're sure to come out on top.

CANCER (June 21–July 22) — It's no good trying to make that person jealous, because it's only going to drive him or her further away. Rather, talk openly about what you want!

LEO (July 23–Aug. 22) — Someone may be trying to thwart your efforts, but you can maneuver with cleverness and subtlety. Avoid any attempts at a real "takeover." Your intuition isn't wrong.

VIRGO (Aug. 23–Sept. 22) — You know what you're doing, and you can demonstrate your expertise with style throughout the day. You'll attract numerous supporters.

LIBRA (Sept. 23–Oct. 22) — You may be disappointed that what you get today isn't what you really wanted, but after a while, you'll be completely satisfied. Beggars can't be choosers!

SCORPIO (Oct. 23–Nov. 21) — You mustn't be stingy today. Generosity of every kind is sure to be rewarded in time, and you're in the mood to be rewarded, Indeed!

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22–Dec. 21) — Although you are working with a compatible person, tension and conflict may simply be unavoidable today. It can be resolved, however, with ease.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22–Jan. 19) — You may be seeking to get out of a negative situation, but you may actually be increasing your chances of danger if you are not careful.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20–Feb. 18) — You may do more than encounter a situation that is highly volatile, you may actually cause it! If so, you must be the one to defuse it!

PISCES (Feb. 19–March 20) — The rules are the same for you as for everyone else today, but how you interpret them will make the difference between winning and losing.

ARIES (March 21–April 19) — This is no time to deny your true feelings. Someone close to you will come to you with a revelation of sorts, and you must respond sincerely.

UM women's track wins A–10s

LaFreniere named the conference's top coach

By Bryan Smith
Collegian Staff

What stood between the Massachusetts women's outdoor track and field team and its first Atlantic 10 Championship was a surging Virginia Tech squad. The perfect backdrop was set for triumph and glory, and the Minutewomen did not disappoint.

Rhode Island placed third, followed by St. Joseph's, Dayton, La Salle, Duquesne, Temple and Fordham.

Overall, it was an monumental weekend for the women's program. Not only did the Minutewomen bring home their first A–10 outdoor championship, the individual accomplishments were unparalled. In addition, coach Julie LaFreniere was named conference Coach of the Year.

To go along with the title and the Coach of the Year honors, UMass had five athletes named to the All-Conference team. The Massachusetts All-Conference selections were headed by seniors Rose Bryan, Shelanda Irish and Raqueil Shelton. Joining the trifecta of seniors were freshman Abby Rubino and junior Sally Hirsch.

The A–10 championships were decided in the final event of the weekend, the 4x400m relay. UMass was in first place going into the finale and atop it stood at the conclusion. The Minutewomen went into the event with 202 points, but they could ill afford an early celebration because Virginia Tech was grabbing at their heels with 196 points.

All that was needed from the 4x400m relay team was a fifth–place finish. A fifth–place finish would ensure UMass at least a share of the title assuming a Virginia Tech win in the weekend's final event.

The Hokies put the pressure on the team of Andrea Comeau, Taneka Miller, Bryan and Irish when they crossed the finish line first, but this group would not settle for a share of the title. In fourth place going into the final leg Irish took the baton from fellow senior Bryan and sprinted to the finish line. When Irish crossed finished the celebration began. The quartet took third place and with it the program's first A–10 outdoor championship.

"Before the race we [the 4x400m team] got together and prayed," Irish said. "It was the best I've ever ran."

Added Rubino: "It was the greatest feeling [winning the A–10s]. Everyone stepped up. We pulled together as a team. We deserved to win. The coaches wanted it."

UMass had built a commanding lead after the first day of competition. After the first six events on Saturday, the Minutewomen had put up 92 points.

"We dominated [on Saturday]," LaFreniere said.

The Minutewomen could not afford to get complacent, even though they had doubled Virginia Tech's 46 points.

"We had momentum on our side. We couldn't let that momentum slip away," Irish said.

Momentum, however, changed hands the second day as Virginia Tech broke five A–10 Championship records, but the Minutewomen, to steal a UMass basketball slogan, "Refused to Lose."

It was the final conference meet for six seniors (Bryan, Irish, Shelton, Nicole Way, Melanie Bell and Tracy Meagher).

"The six seniors have done a tremendous job for the program. We dedicated the championship to them," LaFreniere said.

Bryan scored an astounding 29 points en route to her All–Conference selection. She finished second in the 100m hurdles in a school record time of 13.79 seconds. The senior finished third in the triple jump and was a member of the first–place 4x100m relay.

The 4x100m relay team beat a seemingly unbeatable Virginia Tech squad. The team of Bryan, Shelton, Rubino and Irish edged out the Hokie team by sixteen–hundredths of a second.

"Our baton handoffs were the best of the year," LaFreniere said.

Not to be outdone in all of the action, though, was Hirsch. The junior distance runner set the conference record in the 5,000m with a time of 17:22.68. This performance was on the heels of second–place finish in the 3,000m.

The win was a total team effort. UMass sent 32 athletes to Blacksburg, Va. and 29 of them scored points. Of the three who did not put up points two had personal bests. Additionally, much of the credit also belonged to assistant coaches Jim Giroux and Elizabeth Zimmey.

"It was a coaching staff effort. I made a suggestion to the A–10 that was denied. The request was for a Coaching Staff of the Year Award," LaFreniere said.

Not to be left out was athletic trainer Todd Hirsch. Hirsch aided the injured Minutewomen back to competing form.

But in the end, the Minutewomen stole the show — and the title — from host Virginia Tech.

"Last year they had signs and they taunted us. . . we almost had them indoors, and this time we got them," Irish said.

Said LaFreniere: "I'm very pleased with the overall performance. It was a very intense two days of competition."

Softball squad to host pair against BC Eagles

By Aaron Saykin

Massachusetts softball coach Elaine Sortino has her team right where she wants it to be.

But that's not to say she's content with it staying there for much longer.

With two wins over Virginia Tech on Sunday, the Minutewomen emerged with the Atlantic 10 regular–season title as well as the No. 1 seed in this weekend's conference tournament. With that in mind, Sortino is extremely pleased with her players; however, she won't allow them to be too content with their success.

COURTESY MEDIA RELATIONS
Coach Elaine Sortino

"We're in pretty good shape, but we've got to win the conference championship," said Sortino, who realizes that the toughest part of the season is about to begin.

When UMass (38–8) plays host to today's 3 p.m. doubleheader against a non–conference opponent, Boston College, the games may have little impact on the A–10 standings, but as far as reputation is concerned, the pair of contests couldn't be more crucial.

Sortino would like her team to wrap up the top ranking in the region. By doing so, the Minutewomen would solidify their billing as the top team in the Northeast, and leave no doubt in the minds of the NCAA tournament selection committee. An Atlantic 10 tournament title would send UMass to the big dance via an automatic berth, but Sortino would like the world of college softball to believe that her squad belongs there without the free bid. With two victories against the Eagles today, the Minutewomen would tighten their stronghold on the entire region.

"We have to win those two games because they're our last regional games," Sortino said. "We really want to seal it up. I want to come out as the No. 1 team in the region. It kind of takes the monkey off your back. The Atlantic 10 is our route to the national tournament, but I want that [selection] committee thinking about that No. 1 [regional] team. I want to seal up two places if I can for UMass."

Senior pitching ace Danielle Henderson, who threw both contests against the Hokies last Sunday, will start game one against Boston College. The UMass strikeout queen fanned a total of 33 batters during the two–game set, and broke the NCAA record for most consecutive scoreless innings at 105. The streak, however, ended in the seventh inning of game two against Virginia Tech, which rallied for a single run before falling 4–1.

Sophomore Carrie Jeffries, who usually starts the second game of each doubleheader, is expected to assume her normal role as the No. 2 starter today.

Although Henderson may have earned a day off from her labors on Sunday, her coach is not about to take any chances by sitting her out against the Eagles. The Minutewomen's goal is to reach the Women's College World Series for the third consecutive season, and the road to that tournament begins with Boston College.

"We [still] have a ton of things to prove. Our kids really want to make it back to the World Series," Sortino said. "With people around here, the expectation level is so high. They expect us to go to the World Series."

The Eagles enter today's competition with a dangerous batting order that boasts four players hitting over the .300 mark. Sophomore Summer Jarrat leads the way with an average of .367. Junior catcher Chris Vicari trails Jarrat for the team lead at .352, but has catapulted her average in Big East Conference play to .400. Leah Kamataris and Jennifer Murray also bat .333 and .313, respectively.

Boston College (26–18) has won 12 of its last 14 contests, including its most recent pair over Rutgers, whom the Minutewomen defeated last Thursday. In addition to common victories, the Eagles also share similar defeats with UMass. Both teams have been topped by Hofstra at some time or other during the season.

UMass women's crew takes two from 'Cuse

By Chris Spring

The Massachusetts women's crew team kept its dreams of a team bid to the NCAAs afloat this past Saturday. The Minutewomen did so by taking two of three important races from Syracuse University on Lake Onondaga in upstate New York.

Syracuse entered the race on Saturday as the No. 2 ranked team in the Mid–Atlantic region. UMass' victories greatly helped its chances of being selected as a team to compete for the national championship.

"By taking two of three from Syracuse, they can't take Syracuse ahead of us as a team," UMass coach Jim Dicig said.

The Minutewomen were victorious in the varsity eight and varsity four races on what was a beautiful day for racing. The varsity eight boat finished in a

Senior George a key component to UMass softball

By Matt Frascella
Collegian Staff

"George, George, George of the Jungle watch out for that tree!"

When senior co–captain Becky George steps into the batting box people in the crowd notice a different cheer from her Massachusetts teammates.

George's unique cheer should be a warning to her opponents — watch out for that piece of tree in her hands because she is capable of inflicting a lot of damage with it.

The actual evolution of the chant is far more simplistic than that.

"I have a little sister who plays softball, actually they [her teammates] started calling her George of the Jungle just because of the movie," George said. "I just happened to tell somebody that story, so they [my teammates] started doing it to me. It wasn't that long ago. Actually, it was just last year.

"It is not a normal cheer. There is not really a point to it that relates to softball," added the senior outfielder. "It is just funny it makes me stay light and in the game when I hear it I know they are relating to me and when I am at the plate I know that they are behind me."

Staying at ease in the batters box has been a characteristic of George during her UMass career. Sunday's senior day honors described her as a dependable hitter, a characterization that George agrees with.

The statistics also support that assessment. Forty–six games into the season and George is one of only four Minutewomen who has played in every game.

In addition to her achievements with the bat, George has no qualms about doing whatever it takes for the team to be successful. Batting at the No. 4 spot in the lineup behind the three best Minutewomen batters, George is often called upon to sacrifice herself to advance her teammates. In response she has knocked in 20 runs while batting .250 this year.

"[Cherra] Scooter [Wheeler] gets on base a lot, same with Teri [Rooney] and Mandy [Galas]," George said. "I am called to do either one [bunt or swing away] at the four spot. I have no problem doing either one.

"I look at a dependable hitter in two situations. First is to get something going, or looking for the key hit with runners in scoring position," added George. "Someone you can look to get a key hit."

As durable as she is with the wood, the

Baseball heads to N.Y.; will face Siena College

By Michael Kobylanski
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts baseball team will look to snap a four– game losing streak this afternoon when it travels to Loudonville, N.Y. to face the Saints of Siena College.

UMass (22–15, 10–5 in the Atlantic 10) lost to Boston College 4–2 last Thursday in the championship of the Beanpot Tournament before dropping a three–game set to Rhode Island over the weekend.

Overall, the three–game series against the Rams may have been the most disappointing of the season for the Minutemen, who still sit atop the Atlantic 10 Eastern Division despite the losses.

"We didn't compete all weekend. Very few individuals came to compete," said Massachusetts baseball coach Mike Stone following Sunday's game. "We left a lot of guys on base and in scoring position."

For now, however, the Maroon and White will look to rebound against a Siena team that has dominated the Metro Atlantic Athletic Conference, but has only had mixed results against teams outside of its league. The Saints bring an overall mark of 28–20 into today's contest, but are 21–5 in the MAAC.

In Siena's most recent action, the Green and Gold split a doubleheader with Fairfield University on Sunday afternoon in Connecticut.

Hurlers Dave Pahucki and Kevin Brown have anchored the Siena pitching staff this season, with records of 8–0 and 7–1, respectively. Fortunately

A senior checklist for the upcoming graduation

By Danielle Fugazy
Collegian Staff

Senior undergraduates wrapping up their college career and looking towards the 129th commencement graduation on May 23 at 10:30 a.m. should keep in mind some key issues before continuing on into the "real world," according to the University of Massachusetts News Office.

The number one issue many students don't check up on and should is whether they're eligible to graduate. To be eligible to participate in the commencement ceremony a graduating fee must have been paid. Students can check on their status and whether they paid the fee at the Registrar's Office in the Whitmore Administration Building. Eligibility questions need to be addressed no later then April 30.

Caps, gowns, tassels, and graduation announcements may be picked up at the Textbook Annex until May 21, Monday through Friday 9 a.m. to 4 p.m. Early pick–up is strongly advised. A student ID card is needed to verify eligibility status.

Contrary to what some students commonly anticipate, there is no commencement rehearsal. Students should plan to arrive at the stadium, carrying their caps and gowns no later then 9 a.m. Upon arrival there will be signs with instructions indicating where each school or college is assembling.

Commencement will be held at McGuirk Alumni Stadium rain or shine. In the event of heavy rain, the ceremony will still take place outside but the program will be shortened to approximately one hour.

Tickets are not required and there is no limit to the number of guests who may be invited. Guest seating is unreserved and it seats approximately 17,000 people. Traffic getting into the Town of Amherst and the Stadium is expected to be heavy and may start as early as 9 a.m. Shuttle busses will be running frequently from different lots on campus to the stadium so guests do not have to drive right into the stadium.

After graduation is completed a food court will be set–up adjacent to the stadium. There will be tents where grinders, grilled burgers, hot

Four students charged with false threat

Charges are being filed against four male Amherst public school students in connection with a bomb threat called into the Amherst Regional Middle School last Wednesday, April 28.

According to an Amherst Police Department press release, two 17–year–old Amherst males will be summoned to Hampshire County District Court in Northampton. Two other males — one 15 years old, the other 16 years old — will be summonsed to Juvenile Court.

The four students will each face a single count of making a false report of a bomb.

At approximately 8:45 a.m., the threat was called in to the School Superintendent's office at the middle school. By 10:30 a.m., approximately 700 middle school and 1,300 high school students were dismissed.

The police department made a "clean sweep" of the building, according to Amherst Police Sergeant Scott Livingstone. After visually searching the building, police sent in canine units. No bombs were found.

In an interview last Wednesday, Superintendent Gus Sayer said he would like to participate in the prosecution of the students charged in relation to the threat.

"One of the most serious crimes that one can commit is to put the safety of 2,000 students at risk," he said.

The four students were identified as being responsible for making the bomb threat call as the result of a cooperative investigation between school officials and the Amherst Police Department, the police press release stated.

UM students meet to voice concerns over privitization

A recent consultant service study evaluating University of Massachusetts food services and the campus bookstore was the central focus of a privatization forum meeting held last night in the Cape Cod Lounge.

The meeting was held by the Radical Student Union in response to a service study conducted by a team of consultants.

The report indicated an overall favorable move towards privatization in improving the existing food services and campus bookstore. However, some students present at the meeting were not convinced about the accuracy and thoroughness of the study.

Dave Hammer, a graduate student in the Labor Center, says it's questionable why the report releases certain facts while witholding others that might be as important.

"It's sort of troubling why they chose [to reveal] some things and chose to exclude others," Hammer said. "These are not good reports. They talk about profit loss and not about quality."

Hammer indicates that the consultants chose to focus on only five of the seven areas of all labor costs. He feels it is such "sloppy logic" in these reports which the Board of Trustees will be looking at when they make a decision on whether to privatize the university by June 1.

The service study, released last week, was conducted by the Cornyn Fasano consultant group and the Campus Bookstore Consulting Corporation. The study was open to only graduate students, staff and faculty. Undergraduates concerns were evaluated through a Student Affairs Research, Information, and Systems (SARIS) survey.

The report, focusing on the quality and price of goods and services in the food and bookstore operations, stated that more than 66–percent of the students surveyed said that on an average they were stuck behind a line for more than 10 minutes, waiting to be served.

Senior social thought and political economy (STPEC) major Brenda Santos felt the survey was not clear in asking students how long they wait behind lines. She says many students weren't aware that the study had nothing to do with the dining halls.

The report also indicates that a private corporation would not act as direct competition with student–run businesses. The consultants openly admitted that Auxiliary Services and Food Services would not be profitable enough for their expectations in acting as competition. Santos feels privatization will not be financially profitable unless they make their profit at night when student businesses are closed. Santos does not think this is likely to occur.

Frank Borgers, assistant professor at the Labor Center, asked people in attendance to question what the UMass of the future would look like. He feels there's an immediate need to stop privatization because the political powers are looking to cut the public sectors by decreasing the money the university spends. All profits from private businesses will be geared towards increasing its own total revenue.

According to the Textbook Annex manager, Scott Cashman, the Student Union and Campus Center has always been host to numerous offerings for students. Cashman would like to think of it as the "living room" of campus where students can gather informally. A move towards privatization would be abandoning this concept and moving more towards a "shopping mall" idea, said Cashman.

"UMass needs to redefine their philosophy of operation and provide high quality service and control the cost of doing that," Cashman said. "What we shouldn't do is take money from other areas of campus to support the services we're offering."

Clinton declares national disaster areas following tornados

By Tim Talley
Associated Press

OKLAHOMA CITY — The death toll stood at 43 yesterday after fierce tornadoes destroyed entire neighborhoods in Oklahoma and Kansas. One monstrous twister chewed across miles of Tornado Alley for four hours.

The state medical examiner said 38 people were killed in Oklahoma alone in Monday's storms, spokesman Ray Blakeney said. The combined Oklahoma–Kansas death toll makes this the deadliest tornado outbreak since 42 people were killed last year in Florida. The largest twister formed about 45 miles southwest of Oklahoma City and cut a path at least a half–mile wide. While many tornadoes are short–lived, this one stayed on the ground for about four hours, said Wayne Ruff, a National Weather Service meteorologist. Local TV stations followed it with live broadcasts.

The damage "looks like the Murrah Building, but instead of nine stories tall, it's spread out over a large area," Oklahoma City assistant fire chief Jon Hansen said, referring to the federal building bombing in 1995.

More severe thunderstorms with scattered twisters rippled across the Plains yesterday morning, and tornado warnings were posted for parts of central Oklahoma. A tornado watch covered much of the rest of the state.

In Washington, President Clinton declared 11 Oklahoma counties and one in Kansas federal disaster areas.

About 150 miles north of Oklahoma City, a tornado spawned by the same storm system tossed mobile homes like tin cans, damaged houses and killed at least five people in Wichita, Kan., and its suburb of Haysville. Hospitals treated more than 100 people.

"It is worse than what you can see," said Bob Thompson, a fire battalion chief in Sedgwick County, Kan. He said more deaths were possible, and dogs were used today to search the rubble of homes in Wichita.

Chad Harris was with seven people inside his mobile home in Haysville when it was flipped over and demolished. Two of his companions were critically injured.

"I have no trailer," Harris said. "We all rolled in it. It was the worst experience in my life."

In Oklahoma, the dead included 11 people in Bridge Creek, about 30 miles southwest of Oklahoma City, said Ben Frizzell, spokesman for the state Office of Emergency Management.

Others died in Oklahoma City and nearby Midwest City, Moore, Del City and Norman.

"We're really just getting started on the foot–by–foot search," Clayton Taylor, a Red Cross spokesman, said yesterday in Oklahoma City.

"We have whole communities that simply aren't there anymore," Oklahoma Gov. Frank Keating told NBC's "Today" show. "It certainly looks like a huge battle has taken place."

McCain attacks Clinton

By Tom Raum
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Under White House lobbying, the Senate pushed aside a measure yesterday to authorize a ground war if necessary against Yugoslavia, a vote that prompted sponsor John McCain to accuse President Clinton of being "prepared to lose a war" rather than take political rinks.

The Arizona Republican's outburst, the strongest criticism yet on the Senate floor of Clinton's military leadership in the Kosovo crisis, drew expressions of outrage from Democrats and even words of concern from some Republicans.

But McCain, a former Navy pilot who spent more than seven years in a North Vietnam prison camp, stood by his criticism and his contention that the president's policies are emboldening Yugoslav President Slobodan Milosevic.

A 2000 GOP presidential candidate, McCain asserted that Clinton's reluctance to consider a ground–force option prompted Milosevic's Serb–led forces to more vigorously extend a reign of terror against Kosovo's ethnic Albanians.

"That is a fact of this war that is undeniable," McCain said. "And shame on the president for creating it."

The Senate voted 78–22 to table, or put set aside, a move by McCain and six other senators to give the president the authority to use "all necessary force" to win in Yugoslavia. Sponsors said that clearly included the option of American ground troops. Senate Majority Leader Trent Lott, R–Miss., told the Senate the legislation was "the wrong language and it's at the wrong time." He noted that Clinton hadn't asked for the authority — and had no plans for a ground campaign.

Senate Minority Leader Tom Daschle, D–S.D., joined Lott in making the motion to table McCain's proposal — and Secretary of State Madeleine Albright, Defense Secretary William Cohen and White House National Security Adviser Sandy Berger actively urged senators to go along with the leadership motion.

Voting to table the measure were 32 Democrats and 46 Republicans. Voting to keep on debating it were 13 Democrats and nine Republicans, including McCain.

McCain blamed the defeat on the administration's lobbying — although leadership

NY police officers on trial for beating

By Tom Hays
Associated Press

NEW YORK — Five white police officers went on trial on civil rights charges yesterday in the case of Abner Louima, a Haitian immigrant investigators say was sexually brutalized in a stationhouse bathroom.

The 1997 case, along with this year's police shooting of an unarmed African immigrant, has strained relations between the Police Department and the black community.

In opening statements, federal prosecutor Kenneth Thompson described in graphic detail how the defendants supposedly battered a handcuffed Louima inside a patrol car and then sodomized him in a bloody assault in a precinct bathroom in Brooklyn.

A defense attorney countered that Louima had "150 million reasons" to lie about the incident — a $150 million lawsuit against the city. Louima is represented by O.J. Simpson lawyers Johnnie Cochran Jr. and Barry Scheck in the lawsuit.

Officer Justin Volpe, 27, and three other officers are charged with assaulting Louima outside the precinct. And Volpe and Officer Charles Schwarz are charged in the attack inside the precinct bathroom, where Volpe allegedly stuck a broomstick into Louima's rectum and then jammed it into his mouth. A fifth officer is charged with covering up the attack.

Louima was hospitalized with severe internal injuries that included a ruptured bladder and colon, prompting widespread demonstrations against police brutality in the city. He has recovered and is expected to be the government's star witness. "Inside that bathroom, Abner Louima suffered more than a beating," Thompson told the jury of eight whites, three Hispanics and one black. "Ladies and gentlemen, Abner Louima was tortured inside that bathroom."

According to Thompson, Volpe at one point warned Louima: "If you make any noise, we kill you."

The prosecutor said that Louima was picked up in a case of mistaken identity. Police wanted Louima's cousin, who had actually struck Volpe during a melee outside a Brooklyn nightclub.

"When someone hurts Justin Volpe, he believes in hurting back," Thompson said. "He was furious, and he wanted revenge." Martyn Kornberg, Volpe's lawyer, said the lawsuit gave Louima $150 million in incentives to "cut the truth, to modify the truth, to in fact lie." He suggested another explanation for Louima's internal injuries.

Those injuries were "not consistent with a nonconsensual insertion of an object into his rectum," Kornberg said. Also, he said, there was evidence of another man's DNA mixed in with some of Louima's feces found in the bathroom.

Thompson acknowledged to the jury that Louima lied initially when he claimed that the assaulting officers had taunted him by saying, "It's Giuliani time." Mayor Rudolph Giuliani has made his reputation as a law-and-order politician who made the city's streets safer.

"That lie," Kornberg responded, "was told to create divisiveness in the city of New York."

Volpe, Schwarz, 33 Thomas Bruder, 33, and Thomas Wiese, 35, are charged with violating Louima's civil rights by beating him after his arrest outside the nightclub. Prosecutors also allege that Schwarz held Louima down while Volpe rammed the stick into Louima's rectum and mouth.

The officers' supervisor, Sgt. Michael Bellomo, 37, is charged with helping cover up the attack. If convicted, Bellomo, Bruder and Wiese face up to 10 years in prison; Volpe and Schwarz could get life in prison without parole.

Although most university students learn about social and political issues in the classroom first, the experiences of freshman anthropology major Brandy Curtis have gone beyond that.

Curtis, one of 19 University of Massachusetts students who participated in an alternative Spring Break Community Service Project this spring, had an eye-opening experience during her week of service work. The project, coordinated by Art Keene, professor of anthropology, was a requirement for an Anthropology 397H class.

The group traveled to New Road, Virginia to assess the living conditions of an average grass root community. The living atmosphere Curtis discovered there caused her to think twice about her own living conditions.

"After coming back, I look at my life in a more positive way and try not to take for granted my family and what I have," Curtis said.

Among the 99 percent black community present in New Road, Curtis says the 250 households had no running water and did not have an adequate sewage treatment system. The average family earns $9,000 a year and are not able to afford their own homes. According to Curtis, the average size house is equivalent to three Southwest dormitory rooms.

"We went down and learned about their community," Curtis said. "We fixed dilapidated houses [and] put in new windows... It was just an amazing experience."

Through the class, Curtis is receiving four credits and is required to write a weekly journal as well as complete a 10- page semester project.

The group's main focus on the trip was to find ways to help the help community with home ownership as well as the availability of indoor plumbing.

Curtis feels the trip was a "self-esteem camp" because all the students were supportive of each other and would provide positive reinforcement to the group. Through her experience on the trip, Curtis learned to work in a group setting and made new friends including her roommate for next year.

"There were some amazing people in the group," Curtis said. "We learned so much from each other and worked well as a group."

The people in the community were very supportive of each other, Curtis said. Every day, four women from the community would organize the dinners and the remaining families would help out.

"A lot of people are related and have grown up together," Curtis said. "They share the same histories. The town is not a dead community because the children are there and it will live on because of them."

Curtis feels that after returning from the trip, she has been able to view her life in a more positive was and has helped her appreciate the privileges she has. More importantly, it has helped her to realize her "white privileges" and not to take for granted what she has.

"Thirty dollars isn't just 30 dollars to me anymore," Curtis said. "Thirty dollars is rent for a month [in New Road]."

In acknowledging her contributions through community service, Curtis was recently one of 13 students awarded with the Honors Commonwealth College Citizen Scholar award. Curtis plans to continue her community service efforts next semester and feels this experience has given her a faith more valuable than any lesson of life.

The Honor Society of

Phi Kappa Phi

The Provost of the University of Massachusetts, Dr. Cora B. Marrett, and the Phi Kappa Phi Chapter of this University are proud to announce the following new members invited from the Junior and Senior classes as well as the Graduate School and approved by the Chapter in accordance with the bylaws of the National Society.

Phi Kappa Phi was founded in 1897 at the University of Maine and was originally named The Morrill Society, in honor of the sponsor of the Congressional Act which provided for land-grant colleges and universities. In 1900 it was transformed into a national society by the Presidents of the University of Maine, the University of Tennessee, and Pennsylvania State University. The next chapter to join was the University of Massachusetts Amherst, which remains the fourth-oldest chapter in the United States. The society was renamed Phi Kappa Phi in 1900, from the initial letters of the Greek words forming its adopted motto: Philosopia Drateito Photon, "Let the Love of Learning Rule Mankind."

To be eligible for membership, Juniors must have a GPA of 3.70 and Senior a GPA of 3.80. Only two Graduate students per program are nominated by their Graduate Directors.

The Phi Kappa Phi Initiation Ceremony will be held in the University Rhododendron Garden, below the Chancellor's Residence, at 11:00 a.m. on Sunday, May 16th, 1999. Initiates are invited to bring family members and friends. (In case of rain the ceremony will be held in Bartlett Auditorium.)

sources on both sides of the aisle suggested it probably would have gone down anyway.

"The president of the United States is prepared to lose a war rather than do the hard work, the politically risky work, of fighting it as the leader of the greatest nation on earth should fight when our interests and our values are imperiled," McCain asserted.

"The president and members of his Cabinet have joined with the opponents of the war and lobbied hard for the resolution's defeat," McCain said. "That's a shame, a real shame."

Afterward, Daschle told a news conference that McCain "knows this president is trying as hard as he can," not only to win the conflict but to maintain good relations with NATO allies. "To attack the president in the way he did was unfair and inaccurate." Lott declined to agree with McCain's criticism. "I don't want to get into characterizing the president in that way. I don't think me saying that would be constructive," Lott told reporters. Sen. Chuck Hagel, R-Neb., a co-sponsor of the McCain measure, said, "I don't know if I'd say it that directly." Still, Hagel said, "the one constant that's been involved here is the lack of presidential leadership."

McCain said in an interview that he had not received any negative comments from other senators on his floor remarks and that no one had told him he had been too tough on the president. Most of those supporting his resolution "don't believe he can conduct the war effectively," McCain asserted.

As to whether his criticism of the president might lead to more public confusion, McCain said, "If I was the public, I'd be concerned also.

Clinton flies to Belgium to attend NATO meetings

By Barry Schweid
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — President Clinton flew to NATO headquarters in Belgium yesterday for an update on the air campaign in Yugoslavia as Russia's mediator for the Balkans persisted in opposing the bombardment and a proposed heavily armed peacekeeping force for Kosovo.

Before departing, Clinton welcomed "every diplomatic possibility for the Serbian authorities to meet the requirements NATO has articulated," but insisted that he would not back away from the alliance's demands, particularly on the issue of returning refugees to Kosovo.

"Whatever can be negotiated, it is not that," Clinton said. "They have to be able to go home safe and secure."

Responding to efforts by Clinton and other top U.S. officials, Russian mediator Viktor Chernomyrdin showed "a deeper understanding" of American demands for the withdrawal of all Serb troops and paramilitary units from Kosovo, State Department spokesman James P. Rubin said.

While the former Russian prime minister reiterated the Kremlin's opposition to the NATO bombing campaign, in its 42nd day yesterday, the NATO allies and Russia "are moving closer to a common set of objectives and a common understanding," Rubin said.

Before flying to New York yesterday to meet with U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan, Chernomyrdin unexpectedly requested another meeting with Vice President Al Gore at his home. They had met twice on Monday, before and after Chernomyrdin's meeting with Clinton at the White House.

Sitting around Gore's dining room table, with Secretary of State Madeleine Albright, National Security Adviser Sandy Berger and Deputy Secretary of State Strobe Talbott, they discussed overtures made by Yugoslav President Slobodan Milosevic that the Clinton administration has rejected outright.

Clinton spoke with Annan and British Prime Minister on Tuesday about Chernomyrdin's visit and the situation in Kosovo, said National Security Council spokesman David Leavy.

The main sticking point remains the kind of peacekeeping force that would be sent to Kosovo in the event of a settlement to protect returning ethnic Albanian refugees as well as the Serb and other minorities in the province.

Milosevic has offered to accept a small U.N. force and insisted that some 11,000 Serb troops remain in Kosovo. An estimated 40,000 soldiers and special police are there now and have been accused of brutal "ethnic cleansing" of ethnic Albanian civilians.

The Russians, Rubin said, "have agreed that these Serb forces, paramilitary police and police and special police, need to be removed. They may have a different position on how you exactly define that, but that's a long way from where they started."

WASHINGTON (AP) — U.S. officials are dismissing a report by European Union (EU) scientists yesterday that contends a growth hormone in American beef may cause cancer.

EU officials must end the stalling and lift a ban on the hormone beef or face retaliation, a top trade official warned yesterday. "The supposed new claims are nothing but misleading allegations," said Peter Scher, America's trade negotiator on agricultural matters, calling the report a "blatant attempt" by the EU to delay abiding by its trade obligations.

"If the EU does not lift this ban, we will retaliate this summer," Scher told a Senate subcommittee.

In a report released Monday, the EU's Scientific Committee on Veterinary Measures said the hormone 17 beta-oestradiol — one of six growth hormones in American beef — "has to be considered as a complete carcinogen."

"It exerts both tumor initiating and tumor promoting effects," the report said. "In plain language, this means that even small additional doses of residues of this hormone in meat, arising from its use as a growth promoter in cattle, has an inherent risk of causing cancer."

There was inadequate data to make a definitive finding on other growth hormones used in U.S. beef, the scientific committee said. But it said exposure to small levels of residues in meat and meat products "carries risks."

Agriculture Secretary Dan Glickman and U.S. Trade Representative Charlene Barshefsky said the EU had issued "yet another misleading report."

"It repeats the same unsubstantiated arguments that the EU has already made before the WTO [World Trade Organization] panel of experts, which were flatly rejected by the panel," they said in a joint statement. "The issue is the EU's refusal to comply with the WTO rulings and its unwillingness to honor its international obligations."

EU spokesman Gerard Kiely countered yesterday that the United States is wrong to criticize the report before reading the entire document, which will be made available later this week.

"It's unwise to dismiss scientific evidence. The United States should wait for the full report," Kiely said.

More than 90 percent of American cattle producers feed hormones approved by the Food and Drug Administration to cattle to make them grow faster and bigger.

The WTO ruled a year ago that the EU ban on hormone-treated beef was illegal and must be lifted by May 13. It said the EU's ban was not supported by the proper risk analysis.

Since 1989, the U.S. has exported only hormone-free beef to the EU because of the ban. The U.S. industry has put the lost export sales at $500 million annually.

The Clinton administration is threatening to impose 100 percent tariffs on more than $900 million worth of European products in retaliation for the ban.

Dozens of importers have argued that certain products should be excluded from the tariffs because of economic harm to their businesses.

The administration in late May or early June will release the final list of goods that will be subject to the punitive tariffs, Scher said.

EU spokesman Pietro Petrucci said the 20-member European Commission will examine the scientific committee's report and decide by May 13 whether to ask the WTO for an extension of the ban.

WASHINGTON (AP) — It was a simple question almost casually put to a software executive during his testimony in the Microsoft trial, but the answer he gave — and what he didn't say — may play a central role in the next phase of the case.

Unaware of secret negotiations between America Online (AOL) and Netscape to forge a new $9.9 billion alliance, a Microsoft lawyer asked the AOL executive under oath whether the companies were planning to team up against Microsoft.

In that instant, in a courtroom packed with journalists, months of sensitive talks between AOL and Netscape were suddenly at risk of a very public disclosure that could scuttle the deal — still weeks away from being announced.

David Colburn, AOL's senior vice president and a lawyer himself, cautiously answered that AOL, the world's largest Internet provider, was just trying to compete with Microsoft.

And in what now appears to be an important lost opportunity, Microsoft's lawyer, John Warden, let the issue drop without pressing Colburn further.

The end

"It's surface is covered by the amnion." That's how my anatomy lab text ends. It doesn't end with, "Congratulations on surviving a living hell," or "Wow, you are exceptionally cool because you can find the cucullaris muscle on a shark," or even "Alexis, you are a great person." No, the unimaginative authors of the silly manual have nothing more to say than "Its surface is covered by the amnion."

They might have at least said good-bye, thanks for travelling with us on our magical journey through the drippy, cold and smelly remains of three dead animals. Then at least I would have had some closure to my lab experience. Those authors just don't understand the importance of a good ending.

My friend told me that his mother says, "Endings are more important than beginnings." I used to disagree. If this country had been founded on the values of life, liberty and the pursuit of women in thong bikinis, our whole history would be radically different. I would probably be used to wedgies, for one thing. Or what if the first World War had not been started by an assassination but instead was started by people stepping on each others' feet? Women in spike heels would have won that war.

Alexis Pushkar

Anyway, the point is that beginnings are important because beginnings often set the pattern and patterns are sometimes hard to change. For example, if you decide not to go to your 9:05 for the first six weeks of school, you might find it really hard to start going in November or March, depending on the semester.

Often Hollywood movies with lame beginnings — like George of the Jungle — never seem to go anywhere. Actually, if the beginning is bad it usually means the premise was bad. Case in point: it's impossible to rescue a movie with Brendan Fraser sporting a loincloth while talking to a literate gorilla, no matter what the beginning is.

Usually Hollywood movies follow the opposite trend. Most movies have a cool beginning and a good premise, but Hollywood tends to mutilate stories to the point where they tend to resemble Edward Scissorhands' groin after masturbation.

Endings are important because you remember them more than the beginnings. For example, The Matrix was a decent flick if you think films are about making a profit rather than making a work of art. I came to terms with the cheesy dialogue early on, and dealt with Keanu Reeve's dull performance. What got me, though, was the ending. In typical Hollywood fashion they had to tack some lame love ending onto a film that was decidedly not a love story in the interest of providing audiences with a feel-good ending.

The feel-good ending has taken over Hollywood, and appropriate endings are conveniently forgotten about. Even the movie Titanic, which if you haven't heard by now, sends Leonardo DiCaprio to his watery grave at the end, still has a feel-good ending. They don't resurrect him in actuality, but they show a fantasy sequence in which he and Kate Winslet are accepted as a couple by all of the people on the ship, who also were resurrected for the fantasy. The ending makes you forget how many people suffered in the near freezing waters of the North Atlantic before they drowned, choking on salt water.

Most independent and foreign films have appropriate, even realistic endings. One example is Lock, Stock, and Two Smoking Barrels — oh, keep your pants on: I wasn't going to spill it. But if you want to see a movie with an appropriate ending, see that film. The ending leaves you hanging, somewhat literally, but the doubt gives you something to think about.

Hollywood, for some reason can't let you doubt the fate of the character, especially if the character has been through a lot of near-death situations. Even if a Hollywood movie was about nuclear submarines during the Cold War, the Hollywood people make sure you knew that the main character did get married and did buy a house in the country when the Cold War was over and did have 10 children and did have a dog named Rufus. Even if the whole movie takes place in the bowels of a submarine, the last shot will be of Rufus catching a frisbee on dry land, twenty years after the movie was supposed to take place. It's enough to make me sick.

Real life is much better at finding a fitting end for things. Although I can imagine other possible outcomes for a given situation, I tell myself that whatever happens is all for the best, hackneyed words of advice which all of you should nonetheless keep in mind during the next few weeks as things wind down. Say your good-byes, tie off your loose ends, and cut your losses. The end is near.

If the world ends this December then the class of 1999 is the last class to graduate, ever. Hey that sucks, but I'm sure the Hollywood version of the end of the world for the class of 1999 would go something like this: the first hour and twenty minutes would be a trite formulaic movie about the end of the world; then everyone would die and there would be a moment of silence and tear-jerking music by James Horner; but suddenly the class of 1999 would rise from the rubble, resurrected from the dead, and they would repopulate Earth.

And they would all live happily ever after. The end.

Yeah, that's the way my dissection lab manual should have ended.

A physical and emotional crime

Editor's note: the name of the author of this column has been withheld for privacy reasons.

When entering college, I never expected to be a victim of rape. I always made sure to never walk alone at night or go home with a guy I did not know. I had this preconceived notion that rape occurred at night in an alleyway or in the woods and primarily among strangers. I thought the women that were raped were somehow not careful enough and that rapists were psychotic or outwardly violent. I could not have been more wrong.

As I discovered through personal experience, rape occurs everywhere. It knows no boundaries of day or night, socio- economic background, home or street: 65 percent of all rapes occur either in the victim or assailant's home. In over 50 percent of reported rapes, the rapist knew the victim well. In my case, it was a friend — or so I thought — that never in a million years would I have ever guessed to be a rapist. He was from a nice family and never showed any signs of being violent toward anyone. Though I first blamed myself as most victims do, I now realize there was no way of ever predicting that he would do something like that.

" If the woman does not ever consent to having sex or is not in a state of being where she can make that decision, it is rape."

Initially when it happened, I decided not to tell anyone. There were so many emotions I was experiencing at once that I did not know where to turn. I felt ashamed and somehow blamed myself, thinking that I must have been flirtatious or given him a signal. I was also afraid that no one would believe me. Like I stated before, outwardly he appeared to be a really nice guy. So I kept my feelings bottled up inside until the agony I was feeling was too much to bear.

I told my best friends, who were the kind of support that I needed to overcome this horrific experience. My heart truly goes out to those women who choose to keep their experience to themselves. Without the support of my friends, my life would be at a standstill, so to those friends that listened, I thank you from the bottom of my heart. I urge rape victims to tell someone even if it is a counselor, who is just there to listen.

But rape is America's most underreported violent crime. It is reported that only about 16 percent of rape survivors report the attack to police. Reasons for survivors hesitating to report assaults include: not being believed, reactions of intimate partners, obtrusive hospital or court procedures, long, drawn out proceedings, no purpose thought to be served by reporting, retaliation of the rapist, and insensitivity by law enforcement officials.

Not being believed had to be the most hurtful thing I had to go through, aside from the rape itself. We shared many mutual friends, mostly guys, and when he told them his side of the story, they initially chose to believe him.

The fact is there is only a 2 percent false-reporting rate and that is consistent with false claims of other crimes. When a woman decides to report a rape, there are other horrific things she must go through. Besides reliving the trauma on many occasions to police officers and lawyers, she also goes through the "rape kit." This is what doctors use to collect evidence; it is a humiliating experience and some even describe it as being raped a second time. Speaking from experience there is no way a woman would ever put herself through that unless she was indeed raped.

I never planned on reporting the rape to the police. For some of the reasons listed above I did not think it was the right choice. But looking back, I am so glad I did. Everyone was extremely supportive and it gave me a sense of closure to know that my rapist would learn that what he did to me was unacceptable. It is estimated that 67 percent of convicted rapists are repeat offenders, which means if I had let him get away with what he did to me, he could to it to someone else. For victims reading this article, although I know how painful it is to have to relive the experience, do it for yourself, and if not for yourself then for those women he could possibly rape after you.

When it comes to matters of sexual assault: the only one to blame is the rapist. There are precautions a woman can take to hopefully protect herself from rape but nothing is fool proof. Most rapes are acquaintance rapes or date rapes, so the woman has no idea the person she is with would ever do something like that. Though safety measures can be taken, it is not the sole responsibility of the woman to protect herself. The person who needs to have respect for what the other person is doing is the rapist.

"No" means no and again it is the rapist that needs to come to the realization that he is doing something wrong. If the woman does not ever consent to having sex or is not in a state of being where she can make that decision, it is rape. Whether or not there was a previous history between the two, if that night she was being flirtatious, even if she invites him home with her, if she never gives her consent, it is still rape. If she does not agree to having sex, then two people are not enjoying themselves. Rape is a power issue. It is a violation of a person on both physical and emotional levels. It is about one individual feeling at liberty to do what he wants with a woman's body.

Many people asked my friends, "Why would he ever do that?" The answer is because he thought that he could get away with it. He did not value sex the way most people do. Was it an impulsive act of sexual frustration? Most likely this is not the case. It is estimated that 90 percent of all rapes are considered planned or premeditated, even when the rapist does not define the act as rape. In one survey, 51 percent of college men said they would rape if they were certain they would get away with it. Most rapists report vulnerability is what they look for in a victim. Whether it be age, disability, or women under the influence of drugs or alcohol. Whatever the case may be, it is never the woman's fault and nothing she does gives the man the right to assault her.

It is true that we women need to look out for ourselves; however, letting down one's guard does not mean that she deserves to get raped or should be blamed for it. As I have tragically learned, some of life's most important lessons are learned at the worst times. But let me be the example to every woman who thinks it could never happen to her. Believe me, it can be anyone, and in my case, the person you least expect. The hard facts are that one out of every three women will be the victim of sexual assault during her lifetime. In the U.S., women are raped every 1.3 minutes. I am not telling you these statistics to instill a fear so great that you should be afraid to walk around campus alone, or not trust any man you meet, but just be aware.

As you can see, you are not alone. If you feel that your friends or family are unapproachable I call the 24-hour confidential crisis hotline at 1-888-337-0800. The healing process takes a long time but I have learned that it is much easier to have help. Remember, it is not your fault because there is never an excuse for rape.

The semester is just about over, so if you have something to say, come on down and write for ed/op!

A dedication to the departed

In such a large school it is impossible to know every face and know every name. With at least 25,000 students, it is not surprising that we all don't make it to graduation. I am not speaking of those who chose to leave or found that they could not handle the work. I dedicate this to those we have lost.

In my four years here, I can recall at least five different occasions when I have read of the deaths of fellow students. I remember the horror of learning that one of our classmates had jumped to his own death from JQA during my first semester here — and I cannot even recall his name. And only last year there was the tragic incident when the young man fell to his death from the top of a greenhouse which I pass every day.

Coming to a university of this size has always had its downfalls, but this is one that has never been easy for me to accept. Is it so large that we must remain impersonal even in the matter of death? I could not understand as an 18-year- old freshman how such a tragic death could be summarized in a mere Collegian column. It became no easier to accept as a junior when the most publicity given to a young man's life was a call for greater alcohol enforcement on campus.

Now I find myself in the unfortunate position that the many friends of these victims must have been in. I am among many who sincerely loved a former student that is among the deceased. Matthew Puffer died on Thursday, April 22, at the age of 23. His loss has pained many hearts and brought on more tears than I thought could be possible for one person. Even when he was living, I found myself constantly amazed by the amount of love surrounding him, how many people were touched by him in some way. It is only more evident because of his death that so many more will mourn his loss.

"Matt fought for something that most of us take for granged: life."

Maureen Harrison

When Matt's condition began to look grim, the hallways and lobbies of the hospital were swarmed with friends and family. I am reminded of a comment made to me one day when a friend said, "If I had even one-tenth of the visitors Puffer has today, I would feel like a superstar." It is an understatement when I say he was a miracle.

Matt suffered from a terminal disease called Cystic Fibrosis (CF). When I first met Puffer, I was told that he wasn't expected to make it past 18, since most CF patients don't. But he was a fighter. Matt fought for something that most of us take for granted: life. It was impossible not to be drawn to someone so full of hope and immortality. Matt knew what most never learn: that time is precious.

Many of you had probably even met or seen him. He was not unlike any other UMass student: partying, studying, and just trying to get by. He was a brother at Sigma Phi Epsilon. When they used to have a house, he probably handed many of you beers, stamped your hand at the entrance, and let you keep your things in his room. You may have seen him at Delano's, the Pub or even not too long ago at the new "Time Out," McMurphy's when he visited in January. He may have just been one of those faces you always saw on campus, on the bus or uptown. He may have been that guy that sat in front of you in your math class, or the one that held the door for you one day.

My point is, there are so many of you who have no idea what was lost on April 22. Like many, I was fortunate to know and love Matt, but most of you will never realize who he was in the day you skim over his name in the Collegian. I don't write this to place any greater importance on Matt's life than the many other students who have also died. I write this because all too often, I read of someone's death as a mere footnote to this university and I can't bear the thought that Matt will just be added to that list.

I dedicate this not only to Matt, but also to the many other students who we have lost. I dedicate this to their friends and family who share a similar grief for those who are only able to live on in our memories. I write this because If all that I have now is memories, I want to make them vivid so that no one will forget. Don't forget what we have lost, and most importantly, don't forget what we have, because there is no greater lesson from death than life.

Maureen Harrison is a UMass student.

U.S. democracy and the dream for a new China

By Laura Forster
Collegian Staff

[Editor's Note: This is the last in a series of columns about one man's experience fleeing communist China. Names have been changed for the safety of those involved.]

No matter the amount of conventions on human and political rights the Chinese government attends and pledges to, there are some Chinese citizens who remain unconvinced of the communist government's claims.

Zy is one of these citizens.

Zy describes the communist Chinese government, from which he escaped four years ago while working for the pro–democracy movement, untrustworthy and deceitful. "They have never kept their promises and always enjoy playing games. They usually say one thing and do another."

With the signing of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights last October and recent considerations of electing China into the World Trade Organization (WTO), Zy feels the government which he once lived under is only trying to build an image to invite foreign investors.

However despite the government's claims otherwise, Zy points to the outstanding number of prisoners still in jail for religious and political reasons, as evidence of their true motives. Zy also knows too well, from his own experience, the constant barriers the government puts up against organizations working for democracy and human rights in China. Often the government arrests the major members of the organization, takes away their means of communication and detains the dissidents wherever they are throughout China.

Zy's experience in the United States, in which he first endured a difficult lifestyle in order to survive, has nevertheless made him favorable to democracy. "The fact is as long as people work hard, they can have a good life here. Opportunities are always there."

Although predicting the future of China is difficult for Zy, he sees a weakening communist government and slowing economy in the future, as more and more people lose their jobs. One individual Zy had to leave behind in China and who has already experienced unemployment, is Zy's wife. After losing her job at a food processing plant, his wife is currently living with family members and taking care of their daughter, surviving on the assistance Zy provides her.

Without access to passports and a limited availability of job opportunities in China, Zy has to accept the fact that his wife and family members are forced to live a life of hardship and struggle. "They can do nothing but beg for their deserved rights. There's no place to complain, no place to give them justice. That is their life."

Gain perspective on issues of developing nations by writing for the Collegian next semester.

Seeing the world from a distance

COURTESY JULIA T. SEARS / COLLEGIAN

A street scene in South India captures the struggles facing developing nations today.

The poverty is unfathomable and even slightly romanticized. One billion people in a country one–third the size of the United States. The streets are overflowing with people, their shacks are on the roadside.

This photograph shows a decrepit house, the street merchants selling eggs, a goat passing by and a child with little. But little is all some people know. It is a lifestyle of minimal consumption — a lifestyle of family and necessities and playing in the river.

This is India, a country struggling to achieve political and economic structure like so many other developing nations. To see this way of life can make a person aware of the rest of the world. It can make a person understand how others view America. To experience this way of life illustrates how little a person really needs to be happy.

The term "developing nation" has debatable definitions. Webster's Dictionary defines developing as: "to realize the possibilities of". Commonly, these nations have poor economic status, infrastructure and a new or troubled government system. Consequently, they are trying to improve and become more stable.

A journalism professor at this University once said, "You will never understand the news unless you see it from a Third World point of view." He was so right.

To "see it", was the underlying intention of the Developing Nations page this semester. Hopefully, by offering a spectrum of perspectives on developing nations and the cultures and people of those nations, sensitivity and knowledge was attained.

Next semester, the Collegian will need writers and an editor for the Developing Nations page. If you are interested, please come down to 113 Campus Center and inquire. Ask for Julia T. Sears, Seth Koenig or Ken McDonald.

Sugar Cane Fest reunites cultures for soccer match

Moise Tirado

The day was perfect. The sun and the wind were just strong enough to remind us all of the places we call home. You could feel the tension on the field. By noon, the teams were warming up as the fans and spectators lined up. Sweet spices filled the air from the barbecue grill as the DJ was weaving through the interregional tunes.

Everyone came to see the tournament. It was the eighth annual "Sugar Cane Fest" at the University of Massachusetts, a soccer tournament pitting the Caribbeans' and Latin Americans', Cape Verdeans' and Africans' best soccer stars.

When the tournament finally started, tradition prevailed as the Cape Verdeans faced the Latino-Caribbean team, as it were they who first organized it in 1991 to commemorate and honor those who produced sugar for Western wealth and consumption without ever being recognized or paid for their work for centuries.

Although at times tensions flare and people get hurt, there has never been a fight in the tournament. The memories of those after whom the tournament is named is too important, too central to our identities. Instead, when one player gets upset or hurt, players from every team converge to console, encourage, pacify and remind each other.

The tournament is about acknowledging and consolidating the histories and cultures that has kept us linked from slavery to the present. It's a reminder of our common history and destiny; of our ability to survive, overcome and ultimately shine over our detractors. This reality has, for the past eight years, enhanced the competition because it is maintained that the team who wins best exemplifies the determination of our ancestry and our people.

For weeks before last Sunday, the players woke up early to study in order to make up for the afternoons of soccer practice. Three hours a day, five days a week, they trained, strategized; waiting for "Sugar Cane Fest" to claim the trophy and a year-long of bragging rights.

Comprised of more than 30 players, often many being the best of friends, all size each other up, knowing that they would need all the endurance and courage they can muster to outdo the other.

By the first half, the Latino-Caribbean team was leading 2–0. The Cape Verdeans, who usually dominate the game, were outclassed and could not recover. The fans roared, the music got a bit louder, and this time around, the Latino-Caribbean team would not be denied.

As the match was winding down, you could see the reality settling in. As the referee blew the whistle, the players shook hands and the winners turned toward the trophy and saluted.

Twenty minutes later, the Cape Verdeans and mainland Africans faced each other. Much to their fans contentment, the Cape Verdeans displayed the skills they are so well known for, dominating the Africans and winning the game 1–0. By this time, they were all exhausted, but there were more games to be played and so it went on with the Africans against the Latino-Caribbeans.

At first, the Africans were kept at bay. Controlling, prodding and testing each other, both teams were determined to win and knew that by committing only one fatal mistake, an exceptional player could turn the game around. This player came, a small man named Freddy, that any big wind could topple. His size did not matter however — he was a professional layer, having played for his country, Ghana. He was quick, smart, light as a feather and strong as a lion. With Freddy at the helm, the tide turned, and the Latino-Caribbeans faltered and lost the momentum.

By the time the game ended, Freddy and his crew won. They did not dominate the game but capitalized on some key plays. The coalescence of the African team, their strategies and their patience, created holes which turned into goal opportunities. Someone commented that if our leaders cooperated as well as the players did, much could be overcome. At the end, it was the Latino-Caribbeans and the mainland Africans who qualified for the final. Both teams shook hands, no one laughed, smiled or joked. It was serious business. Even the fans and spectators realized that and so silence reigned.

For the first 10 minutes, all that could be heard was the heavy breathing of the exhausted but determined players and the ball bouncing from one end of the field to the next. The Latino-Caribbean team came close to scoring but their players were too conservative and kept the ball too long, allowing the Africans to recollect themselves and clear the ball.

The Latino-Caribbean team, realizing that Freddy had to be contained, made a good effort of it for the first 20 minutes of the game. But again, his exceptional playing ability could not be contained. The African team had another formidable player who combined with Freddy to attack unrelentingly. Finally the Latino-Carribean succumbed. The vanquished Latino-Caribbean team persevered, missing a few shots and but scoring one. But that one was not enough. The mainland Africans won. You could hear the fans chant, "AFRICA, AFRICA, AFRICA!!!"

The trophy was presented; a three–foot–tall beauty. There was no second prize and so the Latino-Caribbean congratulated their opponents and walked off the field dejected. Yes, there had to be a winner but the most important thing was that a great time was had by all.

This event was sponsored by the Cape Verdean Student Association and the Activities' Office.

Ethiopia's way of life: a portrait of a wedding

By Julia T. Sears
Collegian Staff

Challenged by the cultural changes of her upbringing in Ethiopia to her American lifestyle, UMass senior Bennet Erdale talked about the history, stigmas and culture of her homeland.

Ethiopia changed from a communist government to a democracy in 1991. Struggles arose as a civil war with Eritria, a neighbor state, unsettled the country and created ethnic tensions. Eritria has been in civil war with Ethiopia for many years over resources and politics.

In the mid–'80s there was a famine in the region, a result of the aged land and drought. Many people starved to death.

"The stigma about [low body] weight for Ethiopians is not true although people are not overly fat either. The diet has little dairy products and sweets so you can eat a lot and not gain weight. The famine put that stigma in peoples minds, though other parts of country are very prosperous.

"People's social conditions have been dampened by everything going on politically — even weddings are not like they used to be," Erdale said. "People are not as joyful and optimistic as they were in the past."

Erdale, who is planning her own wedding, explained the rituals of the wedding ceremony as the most important day of one's life. The traditions of marriage in Ethiopia are a symbol of the importance of family.

Family is vital for the way of life in Ethiopia because a sense of community is so important to culture and to the country, according to Erdale. "You do everything with and for them. Any decision needs the consent of the family including marriage and where you live. One never puts their parents in a convalescent home. You are your parents responsibility until marriage and it is not odd to be 26–years– old and living at home."

The proposition: A man and woman court until the man decides to get married. The prospective groom asks a respected elder in the community to go to the woman's family to ask for her hand in marriage. If the family approves, the planning for the big day begins.

"Men and women are not necessarily seen as equal, but the women isn't seen as property either," said Erdale. Almost always, the bride's family pays for and organizes the entire wedding so much so that the married couple remembers to show up on the day of the ceremony.

The ceremony: The groom picks up the bride at five or six in the morning and together they go to the church with close family and friends. The dress for women is elaborate and there is a long shawl which is usually white. Men wear white pants, a long shirt and a black cape. When they come before the priest, he places a crown on the heads of the bride and groom during the ceremony, which is followed by communion.

The breakfast: Afterwards, they go to the brides family and eat doro wot, a chicken dish, a bread called engira and a drink similar to sweet wine with honey and raisins called tetj.

The reception: The couple has pictures taken with the bridal party and that evening there is a reception with 500– 1000 guests. All the men dance eskista in a circle and a band plays all night.

The first night: The bridal party gets the couple ready to go off to their house for the first time. Usually there isn't a honeymoon, but a dinner with the immediate family the following day.

The love story of the Taj Mahal

COURTESY JULIA T. SEARS / COLLEGIAN

The sunset on the Taj Mahal in Agra, India illuminates the white marble tomb in the reflection pool.

This breathtaking marble monument is a haunting tale of love and loss. A beautiful woman, Arjuman Baro captured the heart of Shah Jahan. In 1612, at 21 years of age, she married him and eventually bore him 14 children. It was in childbirth that she died in 1630.

On her deathbed, it is said, she begged the king to build a monument so beautiful that the world would never forget their love. Shattered by her death, Shah Jahan locked himself in his private chambers for a month and when he emerged, his hair was white.

Six months later, her body was brought by procession to Agra where the king began to honor her request. His chief architect began construction in 1632 with skilled craftspeople from Persia, Turkey, France and Italy. The king put an army of 20,000 laborers to work who spent 17 years creating the white marble tomb know today as the Taj Mahal on the banks of the Yamuna River.

Shah Jahan plans to build an identical black marble tomb was ruined by his son Anrangzeb, who imprisoned his father and took over the throne.

Anrangzeb, it is said, was so angry with the huge sum of money spent on the construction of the tomb that he cut off the hands of the architects who designed it to ensure that another tomb could not be built.

The structure is landed on a 313 foot square marble platform in a black and white chess–board design. A slender minaret stands at each corner. The entrance is an archway inscribed with the Koran and inside there are intricate flowers of turquoise, jade and coral inset into the marble.

After the king's death, he was buried inside the tomb to lay with his wife forever.

Outdoor play delivers

ROBERTO DELGADO/COLLEGIAN

The UMass Theater Department is currently presenting their performance of The Mandrake at Durfee Gardens.

By Imogen Lillywhite

THE MANDRAKE
Durfee Gardens
April 29–May 8

Seeing a play at the end of a balmy day on campus at UMass is so much nicer if you see it outside in the Durfee Gardens than if you disappear into on of those sweaty, black holes in the Fine Arts Center. Especially if the play is as well acted and well directed as The Mandrake was on Saturday night. For a suggested donation of four measly dollars, you can wander into Durfee Gardens, spread out a blanket (or set up a lawn chair) and be lasciviously entertained by one of the liveliest groups of UMass students I've ever seen.

Niccolo Machiavelli's farce The Mandrake (for the mature audience) is an energetic romp set in an archetypal piazza in renaissance Florence. Callimaco, played by Andrew Whitehead, is sexually obsessed, and graphically so I might add, with Lucrezia (Aurora Ferraro), the beautiful but pious wife of the doddering and foolish Nicia (Aaron Lyons). The lifelong desire of Nicia, evidence for the case against Viagra if I ever saw it, is to have children. Despite his continued and frequent efforts, no child is conceived, and this is where a mysterious plant called the mandrake and Colin Metz, as the scheming Ligurio, arrive on the scene.

Naturally, as it would, the plot thickens, aided by a dimwitted and slightly camp servant called Siro, otherwise known as Daniel Viens, Gregory Egan as the obligatory long suffering Friar and Karen M. Bordeau as Lucrezia's mother who for want of a better expression, desires only that her daughter should get some action. Alyssa Schneider's brief but bawdy performance as a frustrated widow of Florence who relishes the idea of her humble home being invaded by the Turkish army is one that should not be missed.

I could go on all day describing the merits of individual

New Switchblade, Belew and Black Moon beguile

THE THREE CALAMITES
Switchblade Symphony
Cleopatra

Oh no, Gothic music!

Relax, this album is unlikely to turn you into a homicidal maniac. Despite what MSNBC will tell you.

Formed in San Francisco in 1989 by composer Susan Wallace and lyricist Tina Root, Switchblade Symphony has established themselves as one of the most prominent band of the new Gothic wave. Having toured with Christian Death, Type O Negative and the Sisters of Mercy, the band found success with their first LP, 1995's Serpentine Gallery. 1997's Bread and Jam for Frances continued to expand Switchblade's ever increasing fan base.

The Three Calamites is Switchblade's third LP. It's better than their second and not as good as their first. The opening tracks, "Invisible" and "Wicked" produce a haunting sound evocative of the Cranes. Each track manages to be cerebrally spooky as songs like "Naked Birthday," "Monsters" and "Into the Sky" resonate with atmospheric beauty. Root's vocals and Wallace's instrumentation make this album worth more than just a listen. A (Kevin Monahan)

SALAD DAYS
Adrian Belew
Thirsty Ear

The King Crimson guitar genius has not exactly outdone himself, but has done some interesting stuff here nonetheless. Aside from being the lead guitarist in King Crimson, Belew has worked with such artists as The Talking Heads, David Bowie and Nine Inch Nails. Belew uses his skills almost solely on acoustic guitars, and produces some fantastic results, and some that are just a cut above average. "The Lone Rhinoceros" opens up the album, and lets us know where he is going with it. Very Beatles–esque material ensues, with the two live cuts recorded in Argentina, "Three of a Perfect Pair" and "Fly" being among the best on the disc.

Salad Days is definitely a must for fans of Belew or King Crimson. But you might be expecting a bit more. B (K.M.)

WARZONE
Black Moon
Duck Down/Priority

Say "war is on" three times fast... After a six year hiatus, Buckshot, 5ft. & Evil Dee have returned to declare battle on shoddy record labels and wack crews alike. Warzone follows up their haunting and bass–heavy debut, Enter Da Stage (1995), with a pulsating culmination of tantalizing rhythms and deft rhymes.

Thankfully the Beatminerz, having re–emerged in the Boot Camp arsenal, lay down the production as Buck and the 5Footer flip consistent hip–hop poignancy throughout. "Onslaught," featuring the hyper–kinetic antics of Busta Rhymes, jump–starts the album immediately, as its energetic, well–sampled beat gets the neck muscles throbbing. On "For All Y'all," Heather B. hosts the collaboration as 5ft. shines over a sonic synthesizer that teases our auditory senses endlessly. "Two Turntables and a Mic," is an enjoyably simplistic b–boy anthem and "Whirwind" creates a surreal atmosphere for Buckshot to deliver his sing–song rhyme styles. On the whole, Warzone is a sound effort that powerfully pumps with rhythmic energy. Indeed the war is on! B+ (David Katzoff)

Manson ambushed, Alanis & Tori on tour, Verve splits

By Kevin Monahan
Collegian Staff

Well kiddies, in case you've been hiding in a cave for the past few weeks, thought I'd bring you up to speed on what's going on in the wonderful world of music...

Irresponsible blame anthem...

Since his Antichrist Superstar album, Marilyn Manson has become like an annoying yappy puppy that won't shut the hell up. He had placed himself front and center in a media circus. Now, in the wake of the Colombine High School shootings, Manson has been getting press that he hasn't perpetuated himself and probably doesn't consider welcome.

Ever looking for a scapegoat, 10 U.S. Senators (who probably would allow the Ku Klux Klan to rally on the grounds of "freedom of speech") have written a sharp– tongued letter to Seagrams, the parent company of Interscope Records, condemning Manson's music and lyrics, and requesting that to stop distributing the shock–rock band's CDs. This move comes after Portsmouth, N.H. (Whatever happened to "Live Free or Die?") banned all Marilyn Manson apparel from their schools. The elder statesmen's letter claimed Manson's music "eerily reflect the carnage" at the Colorado high school.

Early last week, the band cancelled the final five dates of their U.S. tour, and Manson himself issued a statement via the band's web site: "The media has unfairly scapegoated the music industry and so–called goth kids and has speculated — with no basis in truth — that artists like myself are in some way to blame. This tragedy was a product of ignorance, hatred, and an access to guns."

Rage Against the Machine guitarist Tom Morello defended Manson in an on–line chat about teen violence. Morello said, "Don't let them scapegoat your music," and blamed the Littleton shootings on politics and guns — not music.

Sorry, didn't mean to get too political there.

Disbanded...

British rockers The Verve and Love and Rockets officially called it quits last week. The Verve's breakup comes as a surprise after years of work together and scoring a hit album, Urban Hymns with the success of the single "Bittersweet Symphony." Verve vocalist Richard Asberoft has a solo project in the works.

Love and Rockets will be playing farewell shows in Los Angeles May 9 and 10. Composed of three quarters of the legendary Bauhaus, Love and Rockets have been writing and touring together for the past 14 years. Frontman Daniel Ash has his eye on film scoring, bassist David J, has a solo project planned and J.'s little brother, drummer Kevin Haskins plans on doing additional programming and mixing for other artists. Count yourself lucky if you were among the few to catch L&R on their most recent trip to Boston last month.

Branching out...

Prodigy mastermind Liam Howlett's current project is working on the soundtrack to a film called The Uranus Experiment — yes, it's a porno movie. Apparently a high budget pornographic movie — it is said to include special effects never before seen in an adult film (I don't want to know). Nice to see Howlett is expanding his horizons.

Summer Concerts!!!

Festivals

–No Lolapalooza. Boo hoo.

–WBCN River Rave at the former Great Woods will feature Red Hot Chili Peppers among others. The rest of the lineup will probably be similar to most other radio festivals across the country.

–Woodstock '99 — Big and corporate.

–Lilith Fair — featuring The Pretenders, Me'shell NdgeOcello and, of course, Sarah McLachlan. Beth Orton and Aimee Mann are artists to keep an eye out for when this estrogen fest comes near you.

–The OzzFest — these guys are metal! Including Black Sabbath, Rob Zombie, and non–metal act Primus.

Say it ain't so...

Tori Amos will be touring with (gasp) Alanis Morrisette, in one of the most awkward double bills since... well, since Alanis Morrisette and Liz Phair. Not clear on who gets first billing. Tentative New England date is August 31.

Try to get to most, if not all of these...

Blondie, Hole, Rammstein, John Lee Hooker with Muxy Fruvous, The Swans, Tom Petty and the Heartbreakers, Bob Dylan, R.E.M.

Not that I condone any of this lame–ass behavior...

Goo Goo Dolls/Fastball/Sugar Ray, Britney Spears, Motley Crue/Scorpions will all be touring this summer.

Jones and Connery thriller entrapped by cliches

Sean Connery disappoints once again in Entrapment.

By Rob Roensch
Collegian Staff

ENTRAPMENT
with Sean Connery and Catherine Zeta-Jones
Playing at Mountain Farms Cinemas

In a televised interview, lead actress Catherine Zeta-Jones (Mask of Zorro) said that Entrapment reminded her of old Spencer Tracy-Katherine Hepburn capers. Apparently she thinks Tracy-Hepburn movies also had a significant influence on the episodes of Baywatch where they spy on stuff. Next time maybe she'll say that Entrapment is exactly like Citizen Kane. Entrapment does indeed bear a great resemblance to Citizen Kane, except for the mind-numbing dialogue, the ridiculous techno-babble, and the long lingering-shots of Zeta-Jones' spandex-clad buttocks. Other than that, we've got a classic on our hands.

Entrapment is an espionage/romance/thriller, and adds it up to less than the sum of its genres. Zeta-Jones plays an insurance agent (how exciting!) sent to track down a masterful, aging art thief (Sean Connery) for questionable reasons. In fact, the only reason the two get together at all seems to be in order to make a movie about it.

The pair pull off a few heists and start to fall in love, but they never generate any real sparks. Part of the problem is that the characters are so vague, part of the problem is that Zeta-Jones pouts like a fourth-grade brat, but the biggest problem is the difference in age. Connery could be Zeta-Jones's grandfather, but the movie never deals with the awkwardness generated by their difference in any deep way. It's just the way it is. The old man-young woman cliche is pushed into absurdity.

On the other hand, although Entrapment is a bad action movie, it is at least entertaining, if only in the "I hope they escape! I'm glad they escaped!" sort of way. It's refreshing also to watch a mainstream action-adventure where the body count is zero. The only really interesting part of the movie is the scenes where Zeta-Jones' character learns to move through a maze of lazers blindfolded, but Entrapment even screws that up, cranking the cheesy, sweeping music and amplifying Jones' breathing, turning what could have been graceful and sensual into soft-porn aerobics.

Let's be honest, for most guys, spending a few hours watching Catherine Zeta-Jones slink around in tight pants isn't exactly wasting time. Still, a pretty girl is not enough to make a bland, cliche-filled movie work. No matter how many times she sticks out her butt. D performances in this play but I will save your concentration for finals by saying that all were vastly entertaining and highly convincing. This is one of those rare performances where the chaotic and humorous tension is maintained throughout the 90 minute duration. Making yourself heard outside whilst trying to be a sexually frustrated citizen of Florence is no mean feat. It is achieved in this play when the players wander out and address individual members of the audience until they are so close that their sweat drips onto your notebook. It is nearly the end of the semester and I lack originality, so I will coin the phrase of a certain prominent movie ad campaign and say, "If you see one play this semester, see The Mandrake."

Super Furry Animals album revives Britpop

By Neale Gay
Collegian Correspondent

RADIATOR
Super Furry Animals
Flydaddy

Welsh psychedelic-popsters, the Super Furry Animals, have finally found an independent label in the States to release their '97 UK smash hit, Radiator, which leaves one to wonder if this whole Brit-pop revolution is over. Hardly a fan of Radiohead or Oasis, I don't know whether to give in and patriotically fly a Union Jack, or to move to a desert island, where I display the good old skull and crossbones in defiance to the redundancy coming from across the Atlantic.

But the Super Furry Animals give me hope for the UK. In an age where recreational drug use is seen as commonplace, the Super Furry Animals create a world of twisted auditory hallucinations, freak-outs, and scrumptious melodies, often sung in their native tongue, Welsh, as a language, is so strange to listen to, that I feel as though they slipped something mind-altering into my stereo, and perhaps they did. The songs are impossible to classify, and the themes vary so much, from evolution, vampire bats, and "The Man Who Don't Give A F%#@," to soy beans and lovers having a German baby.

The Super Furry Animals are twisted, but the themes of their songs pale in comparison to the music they create. A five-person group, liberally using samples and a variety of guest musicians playing strings and horns, the music comes close to sounding like the Beatles on techno. I said close. At times, I hear Salvation Army influences. Clash guitar sounds, and traditional folk music on a psychotic rampage through the hillsides of Wales.

A limited number of Radiator comes with a bonus CD titled, Out Spaced B-Sides and Rarities 94-98. While equally matching the first disc, B-Sides and Rarities does lack one aspect — a lyric sheet. Lead vocalist, Gruff Rhys's voice is often clouded with effects, and his accent is heavy, not to mention that he sometimes sings in another language.

The Super Furry Animals are a refreshing group. They make me believe that there may be another Elvis Costello and the Attractions out there, somewhere on those islands across the Atlantic, playing in dingy bars and basements, tuning up their guitars and planning on a blitzkrieg to the states sometime soon. While the Super Furry Animals are not this group, they would make a great precursor, much in the way of Roxy Music, to something great, an entity that may be here soon.

I'll cross my fingers and start unfolding my British Flag. A temporary brain lapses. Poor Governor "Failure is not an option" Rowland truly believed that Kraft was willing to abandon the sixth largest media market in favor the 27th largest media market.

The most likely course of action for Connecticut will be to retain an ounce of self-respect by seeking penalty money from the Pats. Unfortunately for the Governor, he really has no basis for legal action. Just hours before Kraft backed out, Rowland admitted that in all probability, the stadium would not be finished by the 2002 deadline. And of course, there was the matter of that perky steam plant. The contract explicitly stated that Kraft could back out, no questions asked, if he felt that Connecticut's progress with the stadium was insufficient. For all legal purposes, Kraft is untouchable by the state of Connecticut.

Now, Kraft and the Patriots can live happily ever after. Kraft is happy, the players are happy (quarterback Drew Bledsoe won't have to sell his new house), Massachusetts is happy, and the NFL and CBS are happy (a better media market means better sponsors and more money).

Sure, Kraft probably caused many Connecticut Pats fans to convert to Jets rooters — after Rowland received his bad news, he told the media, "I am a New York Jets fan, now and probably forever." But Kraft doesn't care. It is a very small price to pay for his new hero status in Massachusetts.

That was, after all, his plan all along.

Defense the key for young polo stars

By Adam White
Collegian Staff

Call it a Mecca to redemption. Call it "the beast of the East" versus "the best of the West." Call it a trek toward respect.

However you choose to view this weekend's Collegiate Water Polo National Championships in Davis, Calif., know this: The key for the No. 10 Massachusetts women's water polo team lies in the vehicle that got it there.

It's not a bus, though it has run over opponents all season. It's not a plane, though it has elevated UMass to the pinnacle of the sport. It is a glory to the coach that preaches it and the players that live by it; it is a curse to the opposition it destroys.

It is defense.

"The key to water polo is definitely defense," said Megan Perry, one of three solid freshman defenders for the 29-6 Minutewomen. "If the opposing team can't score, there's no way they can beat us."

The addition of Perry and fellow first-year superstars Jacqui Goodhue and Dana Sinkwich to a team that went 30- 6 last year has indeed spelled doom for the opposition. Coach Dan McOsker's much-heralded "front and lanes" defense is perfectly suited to these athletic and aggressive newcomers, as it capitalizes on their speed and knack for positioning.

"Team defense is a new concept to many freshmen," McOsker said. "Whereas in high school they only guarded one person, at this level they have to really see the pool and help out their teammates."

If it's a new concept, call McOsker's newcomers "the naturals": UMass has averaged 15 steals and only three goals-allowed over its 29 wins thus far in '99.

Goodhue is a major player in the Maroon and White's domination: a total package of scoring (23 goals), passing (14 assists), and endurance (she's second on the team with 113 quarters played). It is her defensive tenacity, however, that she is most proud of.

"We've played incredible team defense this year," said Goodhue, who also ranks fourth on the team in ejections drawn (13) and sixth in steals (40). "Without solid defense, even a great offense won't win games."

Coach McOsker points to Goodhue's mental toughness as another big reason for her breakout success. "Jacqui guards the 2-meter, which means she's got to stay sharp," McOsker said. "She's had to make a lot of adjustments, to different styles of play as well as different referees."

Teammate Perry is a double-edged weapon for the Minutewomen. While her 30 goals and 39 steals tell a story of drive and aggression, her ratio of ejections (two) to ejections drawn (14) is stunning testimony to her discipline and control under fire.

And even though Perry's rookie numbers read like those of a battle-tested veteran (her steals-to-turnovers ratio is a mind-boggling 3-1), McOsker sees the first-year star improving with every game, and surprising even herself along the way. He cites the Princeton game at this year's Eastern Championships, when Perry erased a late deficit with two goals in the final 90 seconds, as proof of this.

"The last goal, the game-winner, came on a skip shot," McOsker said. "When Megan first got here, she swore she would never be able to hit one of those."

Like a number of her teammates, Perry attributes much of her polo prowess to the primarily male opposition she faced in high school. "Against men, you have to learn to outplay someone who is usually bigger and faster," Perry said. "That gives you a big advantage once you play against women. It's almost a different mindset."

While Goodhue and Perry have savagely patrolled the open waters for the Maroon and White, Sinkwich has excelled at an equally critical task: tending the net. The native of Ontario, California has put up a brick wall in goal this season, denying nearly 10 shots per game. Her mobility has made her a force outside the pipes, too; Sinkwich has racked up 29 steals to complement her 189 saves.

"Dana has gotten stronger all year," McOsker said. "The team hasn't been broken down defensively too often but when they have, she's come up with some huge saves."

Her teammates also consider Sinkwich a real "keeper" in goal. "The front-and-lanes is all about forcing outside shots," Perry said. "Dana's such a strong goalie that the likelihood of them hitting those shots is very low."

Goodhue agrees, and credits the strong net-minding of Sinkwich with boosting the intensity level of the entire team. "It really helps us knowing that our goalie is up for each and every game. We play harder just knowing she's behind us."

All three freshmen bring the unique flavor of west coast polo to the UMass program. Perry and Sinkwich hail from the Golden State, while Goodhue cut her teeth at Washington's Bainbridge High. This knowledge of the faster, more finesse-oriented game favored out west could prove invaluable at the California tournament.

"It's much more competitive out there; there are more good teams because it seems like everybody plays," Sinkwich said. "When we beat [Long Beach State and UC-San Diego] over spring break, it felt like we'd accomplished more."

But the four other contests on that March swing ended in defeats, giving the Minutewomen even more will-to-win this time around. As a matter of fact, facing the top California schools at Nationals is about more than winning games; it's about garnering respect.

"A lot of those teams questioned our being ranked sixth at the beginning of the season," Goodhue said. "Now is the time for us to show them exactly what we can do."

What they can do, according to Perry, is limited only by their mindsets going in. "We're not intimidated facing the western schools, like a lot of other eastern teams," she said. "If we play and communicate like I know we can, the sky's the limit."

Sinkwich elects to keep her focus on the yellow ball, not the expectations. "I don't think about winning or losing," said the goalkeeper. "If you just concentrate on playing well, it leads to one or the other."

Don't get ripped off by people buying textbooks in your residence hall.

Each semester we receive reports of people going around the dorms buying textbooks from students. These people are not sanctioned to buy books on campus. The Textbook Annex does not come to the dorms to buy textbooks.

How do we know they are ripping you off?

They make money by selling your books to us for a profit! We pay 50% of the list price for books that we are re-using in the fall. They never do. They want us to pay them the 50% so they can pocket the difference between what they paid you and what we pay them.

They may tell you that they are paying the best prices but don't believe it.

• Craig Szado consistently emerges from the bullpen with the right stuff. Despite the 2-3 record in 12 appearances, the sophomore ranks first in strikeouts with 50. Szado has also recorded three saves on the year.

• The return of Aaron Braunstein of 1997. The right fielder swatted 14 home runs and drove in 49 runs that year. Last year Braunstein had just three dingers in comparison. Now slugging an impressive .346 with 10 longballs and a team-leading 43 RBI, the senior has stepped it up in the last few weeks to reestate his case.

• Mike Kulak refuses to act his age. The freshman, proving his early success to be no fluke, is batting .363 in 31 games. Though hampered by a hamstring injury, Kulak is a necessary piece to the puzzle for UMass. Proof? His RBI single that sizzled straight down the right field line on April 18 to win 5-4 over the Temple Owls.

• Bryan Samela's early struggles at the plate have been erased with a team-leading 15 doubles (9th all-time in UMass history) and three roundtrippers to boot. The senior has also resumed most of the duties behind the plate as he paces a .322 BA.

UMass has nine games left in the regular season before it heads to the Bell Atlantic/A-10 Championships in Boyertown, Pa. May 20-22. It's crunch time for the Minutemen to qualify for the A-10 tournament and then win it. Last year they won the regular season A-10 crown with a 27-12 record but lost to Virginia Tech 7-6 in the A-10 tournament. UMass last made it into the NCAA postseason in 1996 when they won three against Central Florida but lost one to both South Florida and Florida.

The Crimson downed Dartmouth three out of four times over the weekend since beating UMass on Thursday. Last year Harvard went on to play in the NCAA Regionals while setting a school record with 36 wins and closing out the rankings at No. 24 according to the Collegiate Baseball poll.

Though not a considered a powerful lineup, the Crimson has a consistent group of batters who get the job done. Andrew Hulting is leading Harvard, batting .422 with 14 doubles and 50 RBI. Peter Woodfork is second with a .373 average while slugging .424.

Against the Crimson, the Minutemen now have the opportunity to erase past demons and prove to themselves what they are truly made of.

■ Brown

Minutewomen are the top college softball team in the northeast region. With much attention paid to NCAA softball as opposed to other organized leagues, UMass has reached a pinnacle of popularity — one which has included two consecutive trips to the College Softball World Series in 1997 and 1998, as well as a potential one this spring.

"Playing on this team is almost like being in the major leagues," Brown said. "I can take pride in saying that I was a part of it."

As dramatic as her brothers may be, there is certainly some truth to the epic tales they tell of their sister. She has recently conquered the most deadly of monsters to a hitter — the slump. And her triumph was certainly as heroic and as moving as that of any aged epic hero. The shining moment came last Sunday, when the Minutewomen were hosting Virginia Tech on Senior Day with the Atlantic 10 regular-season championship on the line. UMass needed to sweep both games of the double-header to steal the crown from the Hokies, and had already won the first game, 3-0.

With her team clinging to a 1-0 lead in the second inning of game two, Brown stepped to the plate in the midst of her slump. She had gone hitless in the opening game, and her brothers were growing nervous in the stands, wondering when their heralded sister would deliver. She didn't make them wait long, as she muscled a base hit into right field and drove in two runs — the first of which proved to be the game-winning RBI for UMass in a 4-1 victory.

No moment would better highlight her success with the Minutewomen, as she plated the most important run during the most important game of her most important season.

"I've been struggling for a little bit now so when I got that hit, it was a sign of relief," Brown said. "It was senior day, there were a lot of people there. It just felt good. It was what I needed and it came at the right time."

In much the same fashion as Brown's brothers, UMass coach Elaine Sortino couldn't help but boast about her right fielder's memorable moment.

"It was probably one of the greatest hits of her life... the timing was perfect," Sortino said. "It took the wind out of Virginia Tech's sails."

Afterward, her brothers swarmed her like the paparazzi. They were gathering details for their next story to the neighborhood. They've decided to call it The Odyssey.

■ success

"She played so well at the end of last season that you couldn't look by her," said Sortino. "We started her at the last game of the World Series for no other reason than she was just doing so many good things. She's a great kid. She a team player. She understands her role and she maximizes it for us."

But Kenderski is happy to step into any role that the team requires. She wants to win and accepts that her position on the team may be different than that of Danielle Henderson or Mandy Galas.

"My role [is to] lead by example and by my experience and what I have gone through since I've been here for almost four years now," said Kenderski. "If I need to go in and hit I'll do it. I am always ready to [pinch] run."

The same drive for success that fuels the humble senior from Redondo Beach, Calif. on the softball field drives her in her studies as well. She sees very little difference between the two arenas.

"On and off the field I don't like losing," she said. "I like to be number one. They are both kind of the same thing. Just like the fighter you are on the field, you can bring that to both parts of your life."

For most student-athletes, finding the balance between school and sport is a fine art that takes effort and discipline to achieve. And it comes as no surprise that Kenderski is a pro. The senior has an amazing 3.98 GPA and will receive her management degree this month. Just as her team leads the northeast region, she leads her classmates.

"She is No. 1 in her class and has been No. 1 in her class in the school of management her freshman year, her sophomore year, her junior year, and her senior year," Sortino said. "That is unbelievable to me. She is an incredible student. I admire her courage."

Kenderski simply accepts her position with a humble smile. For her, the juggling act is an old skill.

"It is a lot about time management and prioritizing," said Kenderski. "Sometimes I sacrifice going out, but you deal with it. For where we have gone I'll sacrifice. It is a game of sacrificing. You give and take. There are pros and cons to everything you do in life. School and academics is stressed here and it is really important so that has been a focus of mine. It is a big balancing act."

Other people may be quick to lose motivation when they don't see playing time as a senior. It would have been much easier for her to focus on her studies and leave softball behind. But Kenderski continues to drive herself to achieve.

"Motivation builds off each other," Kenderski said of she and her teammates. "You keep on trying. You know your role on the team. Everyone can't be a starter. Everyone can't be the No. 1 hitter, but when you get to that moment when you get that chance... coach always says you never know who it's going to come down to in the end."

The end of this season is yet to be written. As UMass advances further into the postseason, Kenderski may earn a spot in the starting lineup once again, and as her coach wisely states, you never know who will be in the position to win the game. Kenderski will be ready, though. Always.

Horoscopes

TAURUS (April 20–May 20) — There is little danger that your current progress will slow down at all today. You can enjoy a new level of involvement during dusk.

GEMINI (May 21–June 20) — This can prove a highly physical day, and the demands made on your skills and endurance are likely to surprise you. Prepare yourself!

CANCER (June 21–July 22) — You may want to test yourself in some unusual way today— If only to prove to yourself that you've been on the right track all along.

LEO (July 23–Aug. 22) — You should be able to progress according to plan today, so long as you don't get yourself into something of a bureaucratic tangle.

VIRGO (Aug. 23–Sept. 22) — Sometimes you can "wing it" and be happy simply by making it up as you go along, but it is essential that you take a studies approach today.

LIBRA (Sept. 23–Oct. 22) — Subtlety is the way to anyone's heart today, and the more gentle and sensitive you are, the more likely you are to win the prize.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23–Nov. 21) — Take care that you're not really going behind someone else's back today– even unintentionally. Be sure everything is out in the open.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22–Dec. 21) — Trust your instincts today, and work toward a more physical approach to your endeavors. Get your mind and body working more in tandem.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22–Jan. 19) — You know how to present yourself in the best possible light, no matter how dire the circumstances. Today, you must do just that at least twice.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20–Feb. 18) — You may be quite restless today, and it may be time to get in touch with someone from your past who can show you a way out of this current "rut."

PISCES (Feb. 19–March 20) — You're going to have to make one or two important concessions today, and you mustn't make the mistake of thinking you're "giving in" as a result.

ARIES (March 21–April 19) — A display of affection at just the right time can work wonders today. You better be prepared to continue, for someone is sure to get used to it.

Death in sports: respect, reality and aftermath

The thrill of victory, the agony of defeat. This is what most professional athletes need to deal with on a daily basis. Nowhere in their contracts does it say that they must deal with the death of a teammate or fellow athletes.

It is a sad time for sports in an age of retirement, early exits from college to the pros, labor disputes, escalating salaries and ticket prices taking center stage. Today's money-hungry athletes need to take a step back and grasp more than their paychecks, they need to understand the value of life.

Bryan Smith
SPORTS EDITOR
Around the Horn

The New York Yankees honored the great Joe DiMaggio with a ceremony on April 25 to commemorate his illustrious career. A career that was interrupted by war, but nonetheless one of the greatest in baseball history. The Bronx Bombers are wearing the Yankee Clipper's No. 5 on their sleeves to remember and honor a member of their family, a family rich in tradition.

The tradition was continued at the ceremony as the cover was removed from the newest addition to Monument Park while Paul Simon sang "Where have you gone Joe DiMaggio?" from his classic song, "Mrs. Robinson".

DiMaggio's death was difficult for the professional sports world to deal with, but it did not come as a surprise. A man who would rather have been out of the spotlight constantly found himself in it decades after his retirement. Joltin' Joe left a legacy and with it a spot in the hearts of Americans.

All the attention for a man who would have rather been left alone. But what about the unexpected?

Cup craziness is in full effect, but winning Lord Stanley's Cup is nothing compared to the value of a life.

The hockey world received stunning news early Monday morning when Carolina Hurricanes defenseman Steve Chiasson was found dead on the side of the road after his truck overturned.

Losing a playoff series is enough to deal with for one night, but losing a teammate is another. The Hurricanes were defeated in the first round of the playoffs by the Boston Bruins earlier in the evening, but more was lost when the news of Chiasson's death was revealed.

The off-season is a time to be with family, to relax and to look wide-eyed at the prospects of the upcoming season. In an instant this all can change. For the Hurricanes and the rest of the hockey world a time of triumph has become one of mourning.

Death, something that everyone has to deal with at some point, becomes reality in the blink of an eye. In the wake of the Columbine High School massacre, the Colorado Avalanche postponed the opening two games of their playoff series with San Jose Sharks.

This is one of the classiest acts a professional sports franchise has ever done. Like DiMaggio's No. 5 being a spectacle for all to respect, the Avalanche are wearing the initials CHS to show respect for the innocent lives that were lost.

What will the Hurricanes do to remember their fallen teammate? Is his number on their jersey enough to keep his memory alive? Will they retire his number? Maybe they could put a scholarship in his name for underprivileged children. Only time will tell what is done, but it can not be pushed to the back burner.

There is nothing more disheartening than to see NBA highlights on SportsCenter take precedent over a death in the sports community. ESPN put the death on the back burner the day it happened. The NBA will be there today, tomorrow, and in the future, but unfortunately Chaisson will not. Sad as it may seem, the San Antonio Spurs win over the Utah Jazz is pale in comparison to the death of one of sports' own figures.

The Columbine shooting made national headlines and still is prominent two weeks after the incident. When a nation turned on their television's the night of April 20 or read the papers on April 21, they were bombarded by soundbites of the happenings. Steve Chiasson's death is not a front page headline or the lead into a newscast by any means, but on a show with the sole purpose of reporting sports news it is.

ESPN gets a permanent scar for its lack of respect for not doing the morally correct thing and feeding off the intensity of the NBA playoff race. As exciting as the NBA playoff picture is, most will be able to come to terms with the idea that something is more important than a game, life.

Respect for a the fallen DiMaggio was given. The victims of the Columbine High School shooting are being remembered by the entire country. For one day the sports world should put the spotlight on Chiasson, a player who would have loved it, and give him the respect that he deserves.

Rain rescues BC as UMass rolls

BRIAN MCDERMOTT / COLLEGIAN

Annie Smith on a sunnier day anchors down the hot corner for the UMass softball team. Yesterday's doubleheader against Boston College was cancelled due to rain.

By Matt Frascella

It was the best game that never happened.

Outbreaks of steady rain cancelled yesterday's regular season finale for the Massachusetts softball team after the Minutewomen jumped out to an early 6-0 lead behind senior pitching ace Danielle Henderson. Umpires called the game in the middle of fourth due to inclement weather.

The sloppy weather was equalled only by the sloppy play of Boston College. Several fielding errors combined with high-octane UMass offense proved lethal for the Eagles, who were lucky that the rain rescued them from defeat in game one of the scheduled doubleheader.

Despite the rain UMass was sharp in a game that proved inconsequential. BC's leadoff hitter, Summer Iarat, rocketed a ball towards center field, but freshman Teri Rooney snagged the would-be hit.

It took Mother Nature to make the dominating Henderson look vulnerable. The Massachusetts ace fell behind in the count in the early going. Henderson felt that the rain brought her down closer to the level of her opponents and that frustrated her. She played so poorly in her four innings of work that she actually surrendered a hit, if that's how you define poorly.

UMass Coach Elaine Sortino was hopeful that her team could secure two more wins in the northeast region to solidify the number one ranking in the region. Yet, the constant threat of injury this late in the year made the decision to call the game in the middle of the fourth an easy decision.

"I wouldn't have wanted to play those two games in rain," said Sortino. "There is too much to lose and nothing to win, because in the end they're just two softball games in the [northeast] region."

With the conference tournament next weekend, the second season is about to begin for the Minutewomen. Sortino got the opportunity yesterday to see where her team stands as they prepare for important games.

"We came out and hit the ball real well," said Sortino. "What was important for me today was that we come out not as a flat softball team, and even in the four innings that we got to play, I saw that the kids were in a pretty good place."

The bright side to the cancellation of the rest of the contest is added rest for the team. Sunday's doubleheader against Virginia Tech was a fight for UMass. The squad needed two victories to claim the Atlantic 10 regular season title. Behind Henderson they won both games, setting themselves up as the No. 1 seed for this weekend's conference tournament.

"We're tired," admitted Sortino. "[The players] have a lot of pressure on them academically... It's a very tense time of year for us."

On Friday, all other distractions will fade into the background as the team focuses on defending their A-10 title. For the past four years UMass has owned the conference post-season, notching four consecutive conference championships.

Stadium deal leaves Kraft image unhurt

How about that Bob Kraft? He is the man. The hero. The noble one. Willing to pass up millions of dollars to keep the Patriots in Massachusetts... a more honorable man has never graced Boston sports with his presence.

Gag me. In the aftermath of the ill-fated Hartford stadium deal, Kraft is basking in the glory of martyrdom. Who could ask for a better image booster? By turning down the Connecticut legislature's offer of $374 million to build a new stadium in Hartford, Kraft proved to Massachusetts that he is willing to sacrifice money for the sake of tradition. But is the new-sprung halo over Kraft's head the result of an innate sense of decency or a cunning publicity ploy?

Jen Cormier

From day one, Kraft didn't want to move the team to Hartford. That much is obvious. You don't turn your back on nearly half-a-billion dollars unless you never planned to accept it in the first place. The contract signed by Kraft and Connecticut Governor John Rowland was laden with numerous opportunities for the Patriots to squirm out of the deal, no doubt at the insistence of Kraft himself. So, if the crafty Pats owner planned to back out all along, why did he even strike up talks in the first place?

ASSOCIATED PRESS

Bob Kraft

Well, the answer to that will unravel in the weeks ahead, as we observe Kraft reaping the benefits of his sly maneuvering. Sure, he waved good-bye to a hefty chunk of change, but in the end, Kraft got everything he wanted plus interest. Just take a look at what he accomplished as a result of the Hartford farce:

Benefit #1: Kraft can now accept a Massachusetts offer for a stadium without looking like he was bullied by Speaker of the House Tom Finneran. The last time the duo negotiated, Finneran was steadfast, refusing to allow state tax money to pay for a new stadium. Now, Finneran is able to retain his stance on the issue but Kraft gave the legislature a scare and showed them who's in the driver's seat.

Benefit #2: Kraft's reputation in Massachusetts will improve by colossal proportions. He recently walked into a Boston restaurant to a standing ovation. At a Bruins game he attended, Kraft was approached and thanked by many fans. Kraft's image in Boston has been in need of repair over the past few years, since many fans viewed him as the man who drove Bill Parcells out of town. Now, he can rest on his laurels and rake in the compliments for his values and decency. Overnight, Kraft made the transition from money- grubbing NFL owner to local hero.

Benefit #3: Kraft can wield his ditching of the Hartford deal as a "Get out of jail free" card. For the time being, he will be immune to any Patriots-related criticism. Hey, he's the guy who kept the Pats in Massachusetts. He's the guy who was devastated when the Boston Braves relocated to Milwaukee in 1953. What a heart. What a respect for tradition. How can anyone pick on him?

Of course, the biggest losers in this whole sham are the members of the Connecticut state legislature. Kraft wooed the legislature and they fell under his spell, voting to hurl gobs of state tax money at him. Luckily, the citizens of Connecticut have been spared the expensive ramifications of their elected officials'

UM duo set for final run

Brown famous after the biggest hit of her career

Octavia Brown had her biggest hit on senior day, as she nailed a two-run single that beat Virginia Tech to secure first place in the Atlantic 10 regular season standings.

When Octavia Brown goes home, she always draws a crowd.

She's not a member of the royal family, or a Hollywood actress, or anything quite like that. Yet she's somehow famous and, for the longest time, she couldn't figure out why.

Then one day the senior rightfielder for the UMass softball team discovered that her brothers have a tendency to brag. In fact, she learned that all three of them can't help themselves when it comes to embellishing the heroics of their older sister.

She recently moved and has no clue what her brothers are telling the kids in the neighborhood. But whatever they've been saying, she's pretty sure its working.

"We just moved into a new town in Long Island. When I go home, a whole bunch of little kids come running to my house," Brown said. "I don't know who the kids are, but they come because my little brothers talk so much. They know who I am, but I don't know who they are. I just sit outside and play with a bunch of kids I don't know."

Brown's hometown fame is actually rather fitting. Her

Kenderski balances her success on and off field

Katie Kenderski has accepted her role on the UMass softball team, and has become a leader for the Minutewomen.

Katie Kenderski may just be the best juggler on campus.

She has to be to play on one of the top softball teams in the country while leading the School of Management in GPA for all management majors.

She may not lead the team in hitting. She may not have thrown two perfect games and lead the nation in strikeouts, but Kenderski leads by the example of her diligent work ethic.

"The thing that she offered us very consistently was leadership and a great role model for the younger kids," coach Elaine Sortino said. "Here she was — a senior not getting a lot of playing time — but she still came everyday to practice and gave a great effort. The thing that I'll never forget about her is that she never gives up."

Kenderski's diligent work ethic even earned her a well-deserved spot in the line-up last year in the College World Series.

UMass looks to Harvard

By Kathleen Ralls
Collegian Staff

It was a much needed day of rest. In what might have been a blessing, the rain forced the postponement of the Massachusetts baseball team's 22-16, 10-5 Atlantic 10) game with Siena. UMass will make the trip to Loudenville, N.Y. tomorrow for the makeup game at 4 p.m.

Falling into a four-game slide, the Minutemen can only benefit from the extra day off as they prepare to face Harvard (22-15) today at 3 p.m. Last week UMass lost 13- 12 in the Beanpot Tournament Final. The loss was its first- ever at the Beanpot in four years.

To say the team's been riding a rollercoster this season is an understatement, as the Minutemen have struggled to be consistent both as a team and as individuals. Second baseman Shaun Skeffington might be out for the year with a broken wrist he suffered in the second game against Rhode Island on Saturday. Skeffington has been a standout for UMass this spring, to say the least. His .319 batting average with seven doubles and 31 swiped bases will sorely be missed. But here are some positive aspects to think about in the final bend of the regular season.

- Senior Bill Cooke, Travis Veracka and Bill Loonie have been more than reliable as the weekend starters, despite last weekend's rough outings against Rhody. Combined they are 13-8 in 30 appearances with an ERA of a not-too-shabby 4.06. Veracka has struck out 47 batters, good enough for second on the team, while allowing an average of three runs per outing.

UMass raises parking fees to cover renovation costs

By Jake Lilien
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts has announced the official prices of parking permits for the next two years.

By the 2000-2001 academic year, the cost of parking permit stickers will rise by as much as 400 percent.

The cost of yellow parking stickers, available to all University students and faculty, will eventually quadruple. The price of the stickers, which cost $10 for the current academic year, will double to $20 for the coming year, and double again to $40 for 2000-2001. Purple stickers, also available to all students and faculty, will rise from their present price of $30 to $60 next year, and finally to a sliding scale of $55-90 for the next ($65 for students). Green stickers, available to University faculty and commuter students, will rise from their current average of $34 to $70, and then to a scale of $60-100 ($85 for students).

Vice Chancellor for Administration and Finance Paul Page, who announced the new prices, defended the increases.

"There are several reasons for this," he said. "The first is that, for the last several years, [Parking Services] has been incurring a deficit. And with normal inflation and cost-of living increases for Parking Services employees, the deficit will issues. We have not been providing adequate monies for maintenance for repairs of the whole parking system."

Under the University's plan, the price increases will generate funding for the upcoming repair of the Campus Center Garage, as well as planned renovations of 10 campus parking lots.

Among the lots to be renovated is Yellow Lot #10, located near the Mather Career Center, which has been the subject of numerous student complaints.

The price of all parking permits, including those only available to staff, will rise substantially. The cost of red lot stickers will rise from $35-100, to $125, and then to $115-185, while the cost of blue lot stickers will rise from $40-60, to $95, to $80-160 for 2000-2001.

According to Page, the price of parking permits has not incressed in twelve years, which he cites as another reason for the sharpness of the hikes.

"[The hikes] should have been done more frequently," said Page. "We would have avoided as severe an increase if we had gradually raised them."

Fees for parking at the campus garage will also rise, although less sharply. Per-hour parking rates for the campus garage will rise from 90 cents to $1.00 an hour, while per-day rates will rise from $9 to $10. Fees for selected parking meters will rise from 75 to 90 cents per hour.

Variance to smoking ban voted down by Amherst

By Jill Carroll
Collegian Staff

AMHERST — The smoking ban fired up debate last night as the Town Meeting cleared the air about their stance on the issue.

The theme of the discussion, fairness, was made clear in the beginning when children holding signs in the back of the room with messages such as "save our lungs," were told to put the signs down by the moderator because he didn't want anyone campaigning for or against a certain article.

Two articles were brought concerning the smoking ban. One was brought as the result of a petition by Pub and Rafters owner Jerry Jolly, to allow smoking in bars until a state-wide ban is enacted, as long as the bar installs a special ventilation system. The aim of the article was to "level the playing field," for local bar owners who say they are losing money as patrons go to towns that allow smoking.

The other called for local representatives to the state legislature to enact legislation that would ban smoking across the commonwealth.

The Select Board had voted unanimously for the article, proposing a variance in the smoking ban by allowing ventilation systems.

Select Board chairperson. Bryan Harvey spoke in favor of the motion, saying the dialogue between the bar owners and the Board of Health had come to an impasse.

"The dialogue has broken down. Town Meeting is the only means [we have to] move beyond this impasse," he said.

In opposition to the article. Board of Health chairperson Valerie Steinberg said a ventilation system in a closed room that allows smoking won't keep everyone safe from smoke.

"I came here before you tonight to add a little fresh air to the discussion," she said. "[The ventilation system] is costly to construct, costly to [maintain] and it doesn't protect the workers."

She said giving bars the choice of installing a ventilation system or maintaining the ban would be unfair to smaller bars that can't afford a special ventilation system or a closed-off room for smokers.

But Amherst Ale House owner Eugene O'Neil said that isn't something the Board of Health should worry about.

"I haven't been paid in three weeks," O'Neil said of his floundering business that he said is due to the ban. "I can make a special room [and if others can't, you]... say it's unfair to other bars, [but] that's competition."

Several Meeting members expressed personal reasons a variance should not be allowed. Meeting member Walter Stephaniv said his grandfather used to smoke heavily at the dinner table. The effects of which, Stephaniv made clear to the group by pulling from his pocket six medications he takes for a lung problem which he said costs $650 a month.

"If I go into a bar [and breath] smoke, I go to the emergency room... I don't look like I'm ill, but believe me my problems are [very] severe."

The article failed 63 to 120.

Jolly said this was a last measure and he isn't sure what his next step will be since the article was defeated.

"We've got to cut back on employees," he said. "The smaller places may not stay in business."

Steinberg said she was glad to see support for the ban.

"It's a real endorsement," she said. "It's nice to know there is support from Town Meeting."

Steinberg said there is an agreement being worked on in court to deal with the many court cases that have been brought, such as erasing the owners tickets if they agree to enforce the ban from now on. But it is all still preliminary.

If the article passed, it would not necessarily have changed anything. Town Meeting only has the power to make suggestions or recommendations to the Board of Health.

The other article, with an amendment, was passed asking local state representatives to enact legislation for a statewide smoking ban, and have the money tobacco companies pay states after losing court cases be used to help enforce the smoking ban across Massachusetts.

UM lax shocked by loss of friend Eric Sopracasa

The University of Massachusetts athletic community was dealt a blow of the most severe kind last night, as junior Eric Sopracasa of the men's lacrosse team died after being struck in the chest by a ball during practice.

Sopracasa, 21, from Farmingville, N.Y., collapsed after being hit with the ball and stopped breathing, claimed Jo- Anne Vantin, the associate vice chancellor for student affairs and dean of students. The long-stick midfielder was briefly revived and taken to Cooley Dickinson Hospital.

It was there that he was pronounced dead.

"The death of a young person is always difficult to understand," Vantin said. "This one is particularly shocking because of its suddenness and unexpectedness."

Sopracasa was an apparel marketing major who hailed from Sachem High School. Before attending UMass, he was invited to tryout for the Junior World Team, and he played in the Long Island Exceptional Senior All-Star game.

In college, Sopracasa was often counted on by his coaches to cover the opposition's top midfielder when he was on the field — but it is the Sopracasa that many knew off the field that will be missed the most.

"Eric was a wonderful person, a great teammate and friend," UMass coach Greg Cannella said. "This is a great, great loss for our lacrosse family. Everything about him will be missed."

Counselors were on hand to talk to team members and coaches in the hours after the accident, and chaplains and counselors will be available as needed to support all members of the campus community.

Students meet Townehouse apts. in court to settle repair disputes

Tenants' rights; A sticky issue

BRIAN MCDERMOTT / COLLEGIAN

By Jill Carroll
Collegian Staff

Townehouse of Amherst apartments and several students will be in court today after the students stopped paying rent due to problems with their apartments, including flooding and a hole in a bathroom ceiling.

One group of women and one group of men both had problems with their Townehouse apartments, located on 50 Meadow Street, over the last year and refused to pay rent for several months, saying their homes were not livable during the time of the problems and repairs.

But Lawrence Farber, the attorney representing Townehouse, which includes manager, Judi Johnson, the owner of the women's apartment, Sherman Starr, and the owner of the men's apartment Douglas Fraiman, said the problems were fixed in a timely manner and the floods were "acts of God," but the tenants made it difficult for repairs to be made.

Johnson, an agent of the owners, would not comment on the two situations.

A landlord cannot be held accountable for damage to the property that is deemed an "act of God." Unforeseen damages that happen that are beyond the landlord's control, such as lightning setting a property on fire, would be considered "acts of God."

But Tom Coish, senior staff attorney for Student Legal Services, which is representing the two groups, said the floods were not "acts of God" and the two groups should not have been given "notices to quit," which begins the eviction process, after withholding rent because their homes were unlivable.

A tenant can withhold rent if their property violates the Sanitary Code and may endanger the tenants' health or safety.

In court today, Coish will not only be seeking to defend the tenants against eviction, but seek some sort of restitution for the problems the two groups faced.

Of the three women, Alexis Mottola, a junior psychology major, stopped paying rent in February and Anya Stack, a junior English major and Shannon Stebbing, a senior legal studies and political science major stopped paying in March. Some of the money has been paid back, Coish said, but it was quicker to go to court for not paying rent and air the group's complaints then, rather than start a separate suit. One court case can both decide whether the tenants should pay back the rent and then get restitution from the owners.

The problems for the women began in September, when they moved in, they said.

"We had a huge list of complaints," Stack said.

Farber said the complaints, which included the needs for fixing a hole in a wall, installing a toilet, changing the locks, tightening the screws on the front door lock and fixing the back sliding door and screen, were dealt with during the week of Sept. 2, 1998 with the women present. A "statement of condition" was then signed on Sept. 2 1998.

Stebbing said that the screens were repaired Sept. 2, but the hole was fixed later in the month, and, later in the semester the maintenance workers looked at the downstairs toilet.

The women were given a statement of condition before moving in that said there were no damages in the apartment and they signed it, "naively," Stebbing said.

A statement of condition is a form that lists all the damage in an apartment before a tenant moves in that the landlord and tenant both sign.

However after seeing the apartment, the women wrote their own list of things that were wrong when they moved in and said they gave it to Johnson to make repairs.

But what made them decide to withhold rent they said, began in January.

Stebbing said she woke up Jan. 26 to discover a surprise on the first floor.

It "sounded like water running and basically it was. It was 7 a.m. I went down the stairs and [at the bottom] stepped into cold ankle deep water. I ran upstairs and started screaming for [her roommates]," she said.

Stack said they called Johnson, and although it was too early for anyone to be at work yet, they left message. Johnson and another manager came that morning and decided to wait for maintenance to come to clean the area.

Stebbing said that Stack stayed behind until the maintenance workers finished, then she left for class. Stebbing said they were told the workers would not be returning that day, but Mottola's boyfriend, who had remained in the apartment, said workers came back and took pictures.

"If I had known, one of us would have stayed home," Stack said.

But in emergencies, Farber said maintenance workers have a right to enter a property unannounced.

Despite the cleaning, Stebbing said the rugs were wet for a month. The water originated in the bathroom, then continued into the kitchen, dining room and out into the main hallway of the complex. It did stop, Stebbing said, before reaching the furniture in the living room.

Coish said the flooding was probably due to a build up of ice and snow around their building that leaked water in through the foundation.

Farber claims the flooding was not from the negligence of the manager, but an "act of God." However. Coish feels that is not so, since the ice and snow were later removed, alleviating the problem, proving the floods could have been avoided.

But another surprise that prompted the three women to withhold rent was still to come.

Mottola said she was walking upstairs Feb. 3 heading for the bathroom when part of the bathroom ceiling fell in.

"I ran outside [and said to the workers on the roof] 'you went through my ceiling.' They said 'So?'" Mottola said.

The women said a plastic bag was placed over the hole on the ceiling and a board was placed on the roof but it was not fixed permanently until end of February.

Stebbing said when she called to have it fixed, she was told repairs would be made as soon as possible.

"You don't cause a hole in someone's bathroom and say 'it will get done sometime'," Stack said.

It was her "fourth day of work. [There was] a hole in the ceiling. I couldn't take a shower with men standing over the hole," Stack said. "I didn't go to work."

But Farber said the roof was an accident and was addressed and fixed in a timely way.

He said the issue is not the problem occurring but "how it is handled after it occurs." He said all repairs for the various problems were all done in a "timely fashion" and "appropriately" and according to the timetable that if the "tenants wishes in most instances."

The women called the health and building inspector and he came out the next day and found some other problems with the apartment in addition to the hole. He gave management four weeks to fix the problems.

"They didn't call us until

Tenants' rights:

As thousands of students battle legal lingo and each other for housing in the off-campus world this spring, many may be unaware of their rights or the pitfalls that ignorance could lead to.

Some of the ways students don't exercise their rights are when their security deposit is not returned, illegal clauses are placed in leases, or landlords don't adhere to clauses in a lease, such as maintaining the property.

Security deposit is money, up to one month's rent, that a tenant gives a landlord up front. The landlord holds onto the money until the end of the tenancy in case the tenants cause major damage to the property.

Money can not be taken from a security deposit for routine cleaning or "normal wear and tear." This can include scuff marks, dings and scrapes or marks on walls.

The landlord has to put the money in an escrow account within 30 days of receiving it and inform the tenant which bank it is in, where the bank is, and the number of the account which the money is in. It has to be returned to the tenant, provided there is no major damage done to the property, within 30 days after the tenancy is over.

The tenant has a right to three times the amount of the security deposit if these laws aren't followed.

Reading over a lease is critical, especially to catch any illegal clauses in it. But if there is an illegal clause in a lease a tenant does not need to abide by it.

Even if students do read their lease before signing it they don't always know what an illegal clause is.

Illegal clauses can include:

- Waiving the right to be notified before eviction.
- Waiving the right to hold the landlord accountable for injuries and damages caused by the landlord's negligence or failure to repair defects.
- Charging a fee if rent is paid after the second day of the month but before it is a month late.
- Waiving the right to a trial by jury in legal proceedings with the landlord.
- Living in a place that is not habitable such as one with safety or health problems, even with reduced rent, according to A Guide to Understanding Your Rights and Responsibilities as a Landlord or Tenant in the Town of Amherst, a booklet prepared by UMass commuter services, housing resource center and housing partnership/fair housing committee.

To make sure the landlord performs all the tasks in the lease and to keep the tenant from violating any clauses, the tenant should read the lease carefully before signing. Clauses can be changed before signing. Landlords are obligated to explain the lease to the tenants. To avoid disputes later, always look at the property before signing a lease for it and list all the damage to the property before moving in, on a statement of condition.

Tenants can not be obligated to pay for fuel or heat or hot water unless there is a written agreement saying so. The owner of the property, not the tenants, is responsible for water, sewer, garbage and recycling collection.

Other ways a tenant can protect themselves inlcudes getting everything in writing, including repair requests. Also, renter's insurance is available to tenants. It covers damages from theft or accident and, unless the landlord is obviously negligent, it's the only way personal property can be replaced.

three–and–a–half weeks later. Then they were calling us up the wazoo saying we had to let them in [to make repairs]," Mottola said. "[Johnson] started yelling at me [saying] 'this is not going to be on our ass.'"

"The day before the deadline, they tried to fix everything and we stayed home the whole day," Stack said.

But Farber said the reason the repairs were delayed was because the tenants restricted the times the workers could come. So, he argued, the tenants shouldn't expect work to be done quickly.

"You can't have it both ways," Farber said, of having repairs done quickly and at times convenient for the tenants.

But the need for repairs only spawned another problem, according to the women, with maintenance workers entering their apartment unannounced.

Mottola said she was getting out of the shower last fall and heard the voices of two men downstairs. Then she discovered they were maintenance workers working on the downstairs toilet.

"I put on a bathrobe and I didn't say anything. They said somebody called [them to make repairs]," Mottola said.

Farber said the maintenance workers thought they had permission to enter the apartment.

The women said that throughout the year they would come back from class and nothing was missing or damaged, but things were changed, indicating workers were in the house while they were gone. As a result, they put locks on their bedroom doors.

They said they complained to Johnson several times about the workers entering unannounced and they were given orders to give warning if they were coming and only enter the property when the women were home.

"We had made it very clear we didn't want any maintenance workers in the house without us there," Stack said.

Mark DiAntonio and his brother Matt DiAntonio, both senior classics majors and Michael Reader, a senior history major, living in a Townehouse apartment also withheld rent because of flooding trouble that started in January.

Mark DiAntonio said that after an ice storm around Jan. 16, water started to show around the back door and their carpet got damp. Water continued the next day to cover the floor of the kitchen and hallway about an inch deep.

"The water kept coming back," Mark DiAntonio said.

Matt DiAntonio said part of the reason for the flooding was because the "drainage for our unit was all out of wack... it pointed straight to our back door."

Farber said in both the men's and women's situations the flooding was an "act of God."

Because of the gutter and the build up of ice and snow, which also contributed to the flooding, Coish said the flooding was not an "act of God."

A cleaning company then came to clean up the water and left giant fans to finish drying the carpet. But the men said the fans were as a loud as a "blender," and since they were running 24 hours a day it was hard to study or sleep during the days the carpet dried.

"The carpet smells. You can't get rid of it," Reader said. "[If you] walk into the living room, you can feel it hit you."

But there was a second flood Feb. 2. Reader said that flood damaged three couches, a desk and a computer monitor, among other items.

The men then called the health inspector after the second flood and a construction company came and broke up the ice behind their apartment.

"We didn't know what to do. The construction company couldn't break up the ice with the Bobcat [machine]. They had to come back with a backhoe," Reader said.

Then Feb. 4, the health inspector came after he saw the wet carpet and told Johnson she would have to provide housing for the men, because they were not allowed to be in the house until everything was cleaned up. The men stayed in the Campus Center hotel over the weekend while their apartment dried.

Farber said the men had been offered to live in a hotel after each of the floods, but the men had declined the offer.

But the men were dissatisfied with Johnson's handling of the floods.

"In my opinion she... [had a] very laissez–faire–attitude to running these apartments," Matt DiAntonio said.

When the men returned after the weekend and the health inspector approved their living there, they decided to withhold rent because of the past weeks with the floods.

They said the cleaning service that had cleaned the water came three times for the floods and wouldn't come anymore.

"The carpet cleaning guy told us, 'This is the last time I'm coming. This is futile,'" Matt DiAntonio said.

"As soon as the health inspector gave us the OK, they gave us [the notice to quit]," Reader said.

But when the health inspector went through the house for the inspection, Johnson came as well and noticed some things that violated the men's lease.

She noticed five beds in the house, indicating two extra people were living in the apartment that were not on the lease, and the phone bill was in the name of someone not on the lease.

The notice to quit, which begins the eviction process, was given for several reasons, some of which included violations Johnson found.

They included non–payment of rent for February and March, owing money for having extra people living there, the phone bill not being in the name of someone on the lease, violating the sub–lease agreement in their lease by having the two extra people there and some damages.

But the men said they did not have two extra people living there and some of the damages were not their fault.

Matt DiAntonio said they have a friend they let stay over some nights so he won't have to commute between UMass and his job farther away.

They said they also used their study as a guest room and had mattresses in the room, but no one lived there permanently.

The reason someone different was on the phone bill, they said, was because they had problems with money and a friend let them use his name to be billed. The men were suspicious of how the management found out whose name was on the phone bill.

Farber said he was not "100 percent sure" how it was discovered, but it was not by Townehouse doing their own investigation. It came to them "from an outside source."

The men will be seeking relief for the rent during the troubled time period, and possibly for some damage to their property.

But Farber disagrees.

"Everything in these cases has been handled appropriately and timely," Farber said, adding that he is speaking from experience, as he has represented many landlords.

The prices were determined during contract negotiations between the UMass administration and five University unions: the Graduate Employee Organization [GEO], the Massachusetts Society of Professors [MSP], the American Federation of State and County Municipal Employees [ASFCME], the United Staff Association [USA], and the SEIU, a professional staff union. Only one of the unions, GEO, is comprised of students.

Parking Services had originally sought to raise prices even higher, with yellow stickers eventually costing $60, and the cost of purple stickers reaching $90. The rates were lowered during negotiations, though.

Despite their success in bringing down the proposed prices, some of the union representatives expressed dissatisfaction with the final agreement.

"I was disappointed that the rates had to jump so sharply after staying at the same level for such a very long time," said graduate student Donna Krupp, who represented GEO in the negotiations. "and I don't see that as being the fault of the University employees."

Burchfield to be student speaker at commencement

Jesse Burchfield, the current attorney general of the Student Government Association [SGA], has been chosen as the official student speaker for the upcoming University of Massachusetts Commencement.

Burchfield was chosen by a joint committee of faculty and students. He will join feature speaker Rudolph Crew, the chancellor of the Board of Education for the City of New York, in addressing the approximately 4,000 graduating seniors participating in the commencement ceremony.

According to a press release, Burchfield's speech describes UMass as "a first–rate institution capable of affecting change within the state and within the nation."

He credits the University with "broadening" his vision of the world, and giving him "the opportunity to learn from a vast array of students."

Burchfield, in addition to serving as student attorney general, was on active duty with the U.S. Army as a combat medic from 1991–1995, and is the recipient of several commendations for his military service.

He has also received a Stonewall Leadership Award, and an award from the African Latino Asian Native American International Honor Society.

The commencement ceremony will be held in the Warren P. McGuirk Alumni Stadium on Sunday, May 23, at 10:30 a.m.

Panel discussion questions the effectiveness of NATO attacks

By Daniel Ryan
Collegian Correspondent

University of Massachusetts graduate engineering student and Serbian citizen Peter Blanusa made his views on the war in Kosovo known at a panel discussion Tuesday night entitled "Speak–Out Against U.S. and NATO Bombings."

The panel discussion included UMass political science professors James Der Derian and Nick Xenos, organizer of the International Socialist Organization, Jonathan Neal and was moderated by sophomore undeclared major Rui Kotani.

As the focal point of the evening, Blanusa presented a slide show on the airstrikes in Kosovo. Airstrikes which Blanusa called, "Serbia's horror that Serbia is dealing with." The slide show presentation depicted photos of extensive collateral damage to Serbian and Kosovar houses, industry, infrastructure and civilian victims. Blanusa said he got his photos from various outlets, including the Internet and Associated Press.

Photos of corpses, babies in incubators operating on generators, burned–out vehicles and levelled houses showed the damage that NATO bombs have had on non–military targets in Serbia. Photos showing Serb civilians wearing "target" patches, expressed a popular sentiment that all Serbs are targets of NATO bombs.

Blanusa showed the effects which the NATO bombing of bridges, power stations and chemical plants has on the civilian population, such as a loss of water, heat, phones, electricity and severe environmental damage. One photo showed a bridge in Yugoslavia's third largest city of Novi Sad half submerged in a river with a VW Golf on it, "obviously not a military target" Blanusa said. Photos of burned–out busses, corpses of refugees, and shelled out houses in the Kosovo capital of Pritina show the consequences of what one panel member described as "smart bombs going dumb."

Blanusa stressed throughout the presentation the widespread opposition to the Milosevic regime, especially among the students of Yugoslavia. Photos from 1996 and 1997 protests showed thousands of demonstrators out in the street with pro–democracy banners. He was therefore perplexed as to why the United States would want to bomb Belgrade or Novi Sad, two cities which voted pro– democracy in the 1997 elections.

Blanusa said he sympathized with the Kosovar refugees, saying they have been victimized by both Milosevic and NATO. He included slides showing the aftermath of an airstrike on a refugee convoy. NATO admitted to killing up to 75 refugees in that attack. Blanusa said Milosevic forced the refugees out of Kosovo in April "as a military tactic to distract NATO's ground forces. Instead of preparing for combat, troops had to provide humanitarian assistance."

The refugees are now being exploited by NATO and the media, Blanusa said, to justify the airstrikes against the Serbs.

Der Derian focused his contribution to the discussion on what he sees as the reliance of NATO on high–tech weaponry and the extent of collateral damage it has caused.

"So called 'fire and forget missiles' cannot be stopped by the pilot once they have been fired," Der Derian explained, referring to an incident several weeks ago when a NATO smart bomb destroyed a civilian train which entered onto a bridge after the pilot fired his missile. He was also concerned that NATO will soon begin using more conventional, "dumb" weapons. In a broader context, he addressed the reluctance of the United States to use diplomacy, saying that "Military planning now substitutes for political choices, which leads to a certain gradation of violence that, once started, is hard to control."

Xenos added to the criticism of NATO by challenging allegations that a genocide is occurring in Kosovo. He said that ethnic cleansing, human rights violations, war crimes and civilian casualties — a result of KLA and Serb military conflict — are an internal affair and do not necessitate NATO intervention.

Xenos further stated that the bombings have accomplished the exact opposite of what they intended, saying, "It has added to the instability of the region, making Albania a refugee camp and threatening the political stability of Macedonia and Montenegro."

"One of NATO's main goals was to prevent a refugee crisis in Western Europe," Xenos said. "Which the bombings have, in fact, created."

Neal raised questions of U.S. interest in Kosovo by comparing the crisis there to the conflicts between the Kurds and the Turkish government, the Palestinians and Israelis, and the Tibetans and Chinese government. He said that, unlike in Kosovo, the U.S. government follows a policy of "opportunist intervention," providing "arms and support to the Turks and Israelis and is friendly with the Chinese government."

Neal also pointed out other civil wars similar to Kosovo, such as Angola, Mozambique, or the Democratic Republic of Congo, where the United States has not pursued any policy of intervention. He concluded by saying that the Kosovars suffering ethnic cleansing are only the first victims of the conflict, followed by the Serb civilians who are victims of NATO bombs and the mostly young conscript Serb soldiers. NATO ground forces would be the latest victims if they were sent in, a choice Neal does not support.

Amherst resident, David Kloker said that "NATO is not the forum to end this conflict. Every day the bombings continue, it looks even more ridiculous."

Oleg Yatskar, an economics major from the Ukraine who was present at the panel discussion, said that "U.S. actions are beyond bad, It's not just about people getting killed, but about the United States supporting puppet 'democratic' regimes without a genuine concern for democracy or economic development. The bombings help to extend U.S. power over Eastern Europe."

The Speak–Out was hosted by the newly established group, Amherst Against the War, comprised of students, local citizens and organizations who oppose NATO airstrikes in Yugoslavia. The group will be holding a rally this Monday at 1:00 p.m. on the steps of the Student Union to protest the NATO bombing campaign.

Kosovo refugees welcomed to US

By Melanie Burney
Associated Press

FORT DIX, N.J. — The first Kosovo refugees to arrive in the United States were greeted by soldiers, rooms full of toys and Hillary Rodham Clinton, who got a standing ovation when she walked into a gymnasium to welcome them from their war–ravaged homeland. "We want you to know the American people have been very sad and very angry by what they have seen happening to you over the last weeks and months," she said, in a 10–minute speech interrupted by applause about a dozen times.

"Our hearts and our prayers have been with you. Now we want to show you that our hearts and our homes are open to you as well." The refugees — 249 adults, 195 children ranging in age from three to 18, and nine infants — left a crowded, dirty camp in Macedonia aboard a chartered Boeing 747 and landed at McGuire Air Force base. They boarded buses for nearby Fort Dix.

The refugees appeared in good shape. They walked ably and smiled as they went through a receiving line on their way into the gym, shaking hands with camouflage–clad soldiers. Reporters were barred from speaking to them.

Their smiles belied conflicting emotions, according to an Albanian journalist who has been in touch with people in his homeland.

"I know they're very scared," said Isuf Hajrizi, who writes for Illyria, an Albanian–American newspaper in New York. "They know they're going to be safe, but there's a feeling that they may never see their homes again."

Most of the 20,000 refugees the United States has agreed to accept will be directly placed with sponsoring families or relatives upon arrival. The group arriving at Fort Dix from Macedonia were deemed at special risk because they had no family members available to help them or were staying in unstable areas. Among those eager to help is Halil Bequiri, a Macedonia native who came to Fort Dix yesterday seeking information on taking in refugees.

Bequiri, 36, who has lived in the United States for 15 years, said he was willing to take in "as many as I can. As many as my home can hold, until it falls down. At least it won't fall from Serbian bombs."

A 24–hour health clinic was set up for the refugees, and local hospitals were on standby to accept any refugees needing medical treatment.

The refugees will undergo preliminary screening by immigration officials, receive photo identification badges and get dormitory assignments. Albanian–speaking mental health and trauma counselors also will be available.

The accommodations are a far cry from the refugee camps in Macedonia, which are filled to two or three times their capacity. Sanitation is poor and the risk of disease increases as the weather gets warmer.

Even so, some of the ethnic Albanians had been reluctant to board the airplane earlier in the day in Macedonia.

"Of course I would love to come back, but I'm afraid that we'll end up staying in America because of my children," Mehmet Selimaj said, surrounded by his three daughters, a 16–year–old and 11–year–old twins.

Another 400 refugees are expected to arrive at Fort Dix on Friday, and a separate group of 100 refugees are expected to fly into New York's Kennedy Airport Saturday.

The western nightmare

Gunshots are heard. Tragedy strikes. And the nightmare is just beginning.

Two young men wearing ski masks entered Columbine High School in Littleton, Colorado on April 20 at 11:30 a.m. on a mission to kill. The shooting lasted for four long hours, though the rescue team was not able to clear the building for another two hours, fearing that additional explosives would go off, raising the death and injured tolls even higher.

Students hid anywhere they could to get out of the line of fire. Unfortunately, 12 were fatally in the line of fire. At least 20 more were wounded in the rampage. The only good that came of this was the suicide of the gunmen, who were supposedly on a suicide mission.

Emily Vicanti

This is said to be the deadliest school massacre in our nation's history, second being the 1998 Jonesboro Middle School shooting where four girls and a teacher were killed, along with ten wounded.

Apparently the gunmen were aiming to kill mostly minority students, athletes, and anyone who had teased or made fun of them in the past. The two gunmen were referred to as "the trench coat Mafia," as reported by the New York Times. This label was due to the swastikas on their dark clothes and their choice of combat boots. They were never popular and wanted revenge.

Different students commented how they could not believe that this was happening. In a place that they had always regarded as safe, they were suddenly in danger. All who were trapped had plenty of time to evaluate the safety of school in general, and more specifically their school, while they hid in closets, classrooms, bathrooms, and a choir room, which they barricaded with desks. They waited in fear for their lives for their real-life nightmare to end.

The Trench Coat Mafia was a small group of about a dozen students, composed of outsiders that had no other way of fitting in. Almost no one was afraid of them. Their dress was of Gothic style, and they favored Marilyn Manson. They possessed a zombie like appearance, half-dead, half- alive, though basically harmless. Unfortunately, even though the group as a whole is regarded as harmless, two of the outsiders in the group — the gunmen — were not. And because of them, tragedy struck.

After this tragedy, President Clinton gave his normal "I feel for you" speech where he attempted to comfort and explain what happened. He said what most of us already knew: that we need to teach the young to steer clear of weapons and to verbally express their anger and pain. Fight with your mind and words, not your fist and weapons. He also made the point that he does not know why or how tragedies like this can occur. In my mind, it is rather simple. Our society is a violent and unfair society where if everyone does not get everything that they want, then they are personally offended and feel as though they have been wronged by society as a whole. A vendetta is born.

Society is violent, due to the graphic nature of most late- night television shows (NYPD Blue, South Park) and movies (Scream, Scream 2, I Know What You Did Last Summer, Blade, and most other horror flicks), so people think that gives them a right to be violent towards others. Instead of seeking help, or just getting over being teased, the angry take their anger and frustration out on innocent people, and laugh in the process. That's both sick and wrong. Now, I am definitely not saying that Scream and Blade should never have been released. They were great movies (I even own Scream). But they are by far not an excuse for a massacre. They are only an excuse that psychologists and therapists seem to enjoy giving, "the movie made him do it" excuse.

As far as dealing with this tragedy, we can only pray for all of the victims and their families. A nightmare did become a reality, but ended with a double suicide that was for the best. Those two boys hurt the families of the 12 people that they murdered and the other 20 students that were injured. Taking their own lives was the best final murder/decision that they could have made. At least they will never hurt another person again.

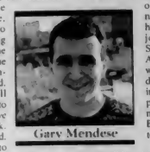
You live, you learn



Can you believe that the semester is almost over? It sure has been a ride, hasn't it? From admissions policy rallies to increased parking fees, this semester has been "interesting" to say the least.

But this column isn't going to be about political stuff, like privatization or the Chancellor's underwear size (although Tanya has said that it's large), it's going to be about the stuff I've learned this semester — and I'm not just talking about academics. I've learned a lot about my friends, my floor and the even the English language. I know that I'm not a senior and really have no right to be giving you words of wisdom, but I'm the writer here, so deal with it.

First off, I have learned that it is cool to destroy your floor. Yup, apparently it is the in thing to do to rip faucets out of the bathroom sinks, puke all over the shower — and it's especially cool to wake up everyone on your floor at 4 a.m. because you can't control how much beer you drink. I can't tell you how many times I've had to call it an early night only to have some loud, inebriated jack-off destroying everything on the floor, while screaming and whining like a six-year old and blaring that stupid song "Put it in your mouth." Boy are those guys cool.

Speaking of my floor, I've learned that when you apply for a job and actually get it, if you later turn it down, you're an idiot. You see, I was actually hired as an RA in my building, but later changed my mind and decided to be just a resident instead. Well, low and behold, I was put on the floor on which I was supposed to be an RA and I don't know a soul on my floor... well, except for the constantly drunk idiots I've already talked about. All I have to say is that I'm so glad that my RA gets paid to... well, sleep and party.

This semester, I've also learned never to trust anyone with money. You see, my friends and I went to Jamaica for Spring Break and I wrote one big check for everyone and my friends reimbursed me. But one kid, who we will call Stephen "Q" Higgins to protect his identity, gave me a rubber check. That's right, it bounced. So, I've been trying to clear up this matter to no avail, as he apparently doesn't feel like paying me back or even returning my calls regarding the almost $900 he owes me. Maybe he just doesn't know that can be considered theft (larceny) and larceny over $250 is a felony. I sure hope someone tells him!

Gary Mendese

Another thing I've learned this semester is that the word "queer" is no longer a bad word. That's right, there is actually an event on campus called the "Queerfest." I used to think that this was a negative term, and that calling a homosexual a "queer" was very insulting, but I guess times are a-changin'. And don't worry, I'm not going to be one of those people that say, "why is there a Queerfest? There's no such thing as Straight Day!" Nope, I think it's a good thing. It's good because it gives people the opportunity to be themselves and "come out of the closet."

Take my friend Bryson, for example. On the day of the Queerfest, he not only came out of the closet, but he blew the door off the hinges. Yup, he officially changed his name to Diva, painted his walls fuschia, and joined the Richard Simmons Fan Club. And now, because the word "queer" is evidently PC, when I introduce him to people, I can say, "this is my queer friend Bryson," and not have to worry about it.

So there you have it: a small list of the things I've learned this semester. And no, that's not all that I've learned. I learned some academic things, too. For example, I learned that cows produce 60-120 liters of methane gas per day and that a pig's orgasm can last up to two hours (no wonder my friend Eric is into Drew Barrymore so much).

I have learned a lot about the dorms and what it takes to be cool (let's write nasty words on the bathroom mirror), and I've learned that times are changing, and how "fabulous" my friend Bryson really is. Ha! Who needs classes — I know the sexual behavior of farm animals.

Truth is stranger...

According to the large book that has the word "dictionary" written down the side of it, an aphorism is a "a terse statement of a truth or opinion; an adage." Now, seeing as it is close to graduation time — a time when almost by definition these "terse statements" are tossed around quite freely — I decided that it would pay to take a look at these statements and see if they still are useful to us in the nineties.

Chris Collins

Okay, the one I would like to start with is the old classic from Romeo and Juliet that goes "What's in a name? That which we call a rose / By any other name would smell as sweet." Now, let's be honest. If I had a girlfriend and I gave her a bunch of red flowers that were exactly the same as roses but were called "ugly blossoms" or "rotten-egg-flowers" or something as disgusting, would she be all that impressed with my loving gesture? I doubt it. So I think, as well-respected a writer as Shakespeare is, he missed the mark on this one.

Another aphorism that, at least to me, seems a little silly is "If at first you don't succeed, try, try again." Now, this makes some sense in the idea that yes, if you fail at something it you should definitely try it again, but it kinda' misses the point. If you failed, there was a reason you did, and until you figure out what that cause is, I suggest you don't keep trying.

For example, let's say you are trying to climb Mount Everest. Now, let's say you are an out-of-shape columnist who feels that one year living on Orchard Hill is enough training to conquer the mountain. Now, no matter how much I... uh I mean, this imaginary columnist tries to climb Everest it isn't going to happen, I could try a thousand times, and I would still end up on my butt until I decide to change the fact that I... uh, I mean, the imaginary guy is an out of shape columnist with a deluded self-perception.

I would fix this with something like, "If at first you don't succeed, you need to do your homework, figure out what the hell's the matter with you, and then try again if you still want to." Of course, my version is a little too verbose for most graduation cards, but still I like it.

My favorite little gem of knowledge, is: "Don't trust everything you read." Now, I can see you guys wondering why I would find a problem with this. My problem is that following it makes life so much harder. Sure, I would love to believe everything that I read, including things like Bill Clinton having an alien love child or that Strom Thurmond is still alive. It would make life so much easier. Therefore, I think you should believe everything you read.

[Note: if the author's belief in everything that he reads were all encompassing, then he would have an amazing time explaining how he manages to read the statement, "Don't trust everything you read"— this type of paradox is called a Catch-22, for more on this there is a book about them, called, surprisingly-enough, Catch-22.]

Another faithful aphorism that I wouldn't mind doing away with is "opposites attract." Now yes, I suppose on the surface some people could argue that this is a truth (after all, we all should believe what we read), but no. Take for example, an ultra left-wing serial killer feminist who likes to knit sweaters and a Republican farmer who dislikes wearing sweaters.

One must admit that they are opposites — really opposite, if you ask me. These people would never fall in love because not only does she live in a prison in California while he owns a farm in Iowa, but also because they have nothing to base their relationship on.

Imagine their first conversation.

Farmer: So, I hear you like to kill men after giving them sweaters.

Woman: Yes, would you like a sweater? I've made eighteen of them since I was sent to jail.

Farmer: Uh... I'd rather not, seeing as I don't like sweaters.

Woman: You don't like sweaters? I should kill you!

Farmer: I'd rather you didn't.

Woman: See we never do anything together!

Anyway, hopefully you get the idea and I don't need to explain it anymore. So folks, enjoy your life and be very careful which of those little aphorisms you subscribe to.

Pointing the finger

Does life imitate art? Movies, music and games are blamed for the shootings in Colorado, but what happened at Columbine High was a tragedy, an unspeakable horror, an unearthly glimpse into hell. And it was not Marilyn Manson's fault.

Nor was it caused by the German metal/hate/industrial noise band Rammstein, Leonardo DiCaprio's dream sequence in The Basketball Diaries, or even the ultraviolent video game, "Doom." Cable news channels and network news programs are currently filling hours of programming time with the "violent movies/music/TV shows/Internet sites scapegoat" argument in special reports with names like "Killing at Columbine High: The Day After" ("Dateline") and "High School Terror" ("20/20"). It's no surprise. We are, by nature, afraid of things we can't control. When something inexplicable like Columbine ambushes us, our natural response is to talk about it — cover it so thoroughly with theories and explanations and blame that it can't leap out at us again.

Tehani Schneider

But does pointing the finger at video games and violent movies ever work? Does it ever stop kids from blowing each other away? No, not after Pearl, Miss. Not after West Paducah, Ky. Not after Springfield, Ore., or after Fayetteville, Tenn. After each of those incidents, we wailed, wept and decried the corrupting influence of the entertainment industry. And nothing changed.

You know why? Because while violent/gory/sexual graphic images can certainly affect us or desensitize us after repeated viewings so that it takes more and more to shock us — they do not, can not, create dangerous urges in people who don't already possess those urges inside them. A healthy and well adjusted individual who watches "Natural Born Killers" over and over — as Eric Harris and Dylan Klebold reportedly did — is not going to suddenly feel the need to commit a murderous act. Movies, as much as we idolize them, simply don't have that power.

I'm not trying to let Hollywood off the hook. I truly believe that a diet of violent, death-obsessed video games, music and movies definitely exacerbates and inflames the antisocial, nihilistic, and even murderous emotions of kids who are mentally disturbed. It is irresponsible for entertainment aimed at kids to glorify, glamorize or diminish the impact of guns, violence, sex, etc., because there's always the chance that an unstable kid will somehow extract and act on the wrong message.

But what makes more sense, abolishing all forms of entertainment that may negatively influence vulnerable teens, or working harder to identify those individuals who are depressed, angry, and in need of help? Hundreds of thousands of kids across the nation play "Doom," only two of them went on a shooting rampage at Columbine High. Is villifying these forms of entertainment really the answer?

For the "Datelines" and "20/20's" of the world, the answer is yes. There's only so much footage of weeping kids and bloody victims available to pack into an hour-long news show; blaming Marilyn Manson's music means you can slap a 15-second clip of the shock-rocker in concert on the screen. Condemning "The Basketball Diaries" is even better — that allows producers to include an image of one of the world's hottest young movie stars, Leonardo DiCaprio, in their broadcast. It fills time and it looks provocative. And even more important, it feels good to place blame. But it doesn't get us any closer to understanding this horrific tragedy. Maybe nothing will. There was nothing those two kids might have experienced or been influenced by in their lifetimes that equaled the devastation of a community. One Columbine student, when asked why this happened, just shook his head: "There is no why."

Paper, rock, scissors

Some learning institutions understand the concept of higher learning, and others are truly oblivious to this concept. After three semesters at Harvard, my parents could no longer afford to send me there and I was forced to enroll at the much cheaper university which I now attend, UMass.

Alas, I was forced to make the change from a university that defines higher learning to one whose answer to higher learning is building the tallest damn library ever. Anyway, when I transferred here all but three of my credits came with me. This pleased me because I would not be that far behind and would be able to graduate on time.

The only unpleasant part of this situation was the one course that UMass decided not to accept. The fact that Harvard holds this course in such high regard and UMass shuns it is what made me realize that this is a university which cannot be taken seriously. The course of which I am speaking and which I received an 'A' in is Communication 364: "The In Depth Analysis of Paper, Rock, Scissors."

Part of me was genuinely depressed when I heard this news. "Paper, Rock, Scissors" had been my favorite class at the collegiate level. It was taught by a professor whom I truly admired named Prof. Toromierda. The students were utterly immersed in his lectures. The class was split into two sections. The first half of the semester was dedicated to the intricacies of "Paper, Rock, Scissors" and the second half was dedicated to the personal "shooting" habits of different types of people.

As a result of taking this class, not only do I consider myself a more-informed person, but I've also found myself to be more well-versed in the way the world truly works. This is why it was such a letdown — one may even say "bummer" — that my credits for this class were revoked.

For this reason, I have made it my responsibility to inform all of you of the intricacies of "P. R. S." By holding the secrets of the paper, the rock and the scissors you will be able to solve up to 90% of your life's problems. If you can learn to anticipate others' tactics, then chances are, you will always get the last piece of pizza, always ride shotgun and you will never have to throw in the extra dollar for beer.

The following is a list of highly probable tactics of certain types of people. This will help you to dominate in the ever competitive world of "Paper, Rock, Scissors."

Dan Viens

The elderly man. These people are guaranteed to throw a rock on the first time. The reason for this is that they are obsessed with their own impotence and Viagra use that all they can think about is things that are rock-hard.

The hippie/MASSPIRG worker. They will infallibly throw scissors first. It's not because they have a scissors fetish, but because the only paper they will use has to be recycled and they feel that by using a rock they will be disturbing the earth's natural state.

The Ku Klux Klan member. I don't know why you would ever take the time to play with a KKK member, but if you do you can be sure that they will throw paper first. This is for the simple reason that most paper is white.

Militant lesbians. These lovely ladies will undoubtedly throw scissors on the first try for two reasons. These reasons are that they all love and try to look like the famous WWF wrestler Brutus "The Barber" Beefcake.

Sylvester Stallone. You probably think that he would throw a rock because of his role in the Rocky movies. The truth is, that he actually throws paper first (I know for a fact because I played against him at the grand opening of Planet Hollywood: Montreal). The reason for this is that he is deathly afraid of paper-cuts and his therapist thinks that by throwing paper he can slowly outgrow this fear.

These are just a few sub-classes and their "Paper, Rock, Scissors" tactics. To learn more you should pick up Prof. Toromierda's book on the subject. It will truly give you the key to unlock a simpler life.

Summer Sizzles with Sandler, Smith and Sex!

Will Smith returns to the world of summer movies with Wild, Wild West.

Adam Martignetti
Collegian Staff

As the school year winds down, Hollywood prepares for another blockbuster summer filled with high budget action flicks, wacky comedies, cheesy sequels, and a few well-placed gems. While asteroids captured the attention of American audiences last summer (Deep Impact and Armageddon), this year it may very well be sex — that's right.

The teenage comedy American Pie, is being billed as this year's There's Something About Mary. If the rumor about the movie getting three NC-17 ratings before it received an R is true, then American Pie could be well on it's way. The story follows four high-school males on a journey to lose their virginity before graduation. Just wait to find out what that title really means.

The other sex flick is the long awaited and highly secretive Eyes Wide Shut. Since Stanley Kubrick's death, debate has ensued about whether Warner Brothers would re-edit the film, which has reportedly been slapped with an NC-17, to get an R rating. Tom Cruise, who stars with wife Nicole Kidman in this psychological sex thriller, is fighting the move. Anyone who's seen the uncensored trailer hopes things stay exactly as they are.

Look for Julia Roberts this summer, twice. She stars as a headline grabbing, overexposed, highly paid, beautiful actress (ahh, herself?) opposite Hugh Grant in the old- fashioned romance, Notting Hill. Grant plays a small-town bookstore owner who falls for polar opposite Roberts before discovering that his simple life has been turned upside down. Then, Roberts takes on the role of fickle bride opposite Richard Gere in the romantic comedy, Runaway Bride, a.k.a. Pretty Woman 2.

Ex-Saturday Night Live stars will also be in the spotlight this summer. In perhaps the most anticipated sequel since Scream 2, Mike Meyers rolls out Austin Powers: The Spy Who Shagged Me — the second in the series with eyes toward an established franchise. This time around, super-agent, Austin Powers, goes back in time to reclaim his mojo, stolen by Dr. Evil.

Basically, it's all just Meyers being his wacky, hilarious self, which should be more than enough for his now cult- like following. With female characters, Felicity Shagwell and Ivana Humpalot, plus Myers playing upwards of five different characters, the movie promises lots of laughs.

Fresh off his enormous success in The Waterboy, the real king of the world, Adam Sandler, returns with Big Daddy. Sandler gets a kid to impress a girl; funny "pee-pee" jokes follow. Pretty standard fare for Sandler, but one has to wonder when the formula will stop working.

If you're looking for more familiar faces, then just wait until July 4th. That's right, Will Smith returns for another Independence Day weekend, this time with Wild Wild West. Smith plays Jim West, a secret agent in the 1860s trying to save the world from gadget-obsessed midget, Dr. Arliss, played by Kenneth Branagh.

Although the trailer looks just plain confusing, and only Mel Brooks would put a black man in a western, look for Will to clean up again with West.

In the world of animation, Disney tries to corrupt yet another classic tale with Tarzan, which will make tons of money, because, well, it's a Disney cartoon, there's little competition in the children's market, and the usual huge tie- in toy deal with McDonald's.

On the complete opposite end of the spectrum, there's South Park: Bigger, Longer, and Uncut. Basically, they can all swear now, which, from what I understand, is the plot. Creators, Trey Parker and Matt Stone, are supposedly upset at the MPAA for giving their previous movie Orgazmo an NC-17 rating and promise a particularly crude version. South Park's most recent TV ratings dropped by half from last year, so hopefully the movie will help the fad die and burn.

Big, bad creatures, other than Cartman, will be on the prowl this summer. Deep Blue Sea, starring Samuel L. Jackson, features genetically engineered sharks that somehow rage out of control off Mexico's coast. Steven Spielberg should be outraged as not one, but two of his films are being ripped off here (Jaws + Jurassic Park).

Elsewhere, Bill Pullman and Bridget Fonda do battle with a 35-foot man-killing alligator in Lake Placid. TV's David E. Kelly (Ally McBeal, The Practice) penned the script, so there's hope yet.

In more lighthearted fare, Steve Martin teams with Eddie Murphy in the outlandish comedy, Bowfinger. Martin is loser producer Bobby Bowfinger, who can't get a high profile Hollywood star (Murphy) to be in his latest alien flick. Solution: Stalk him and shoot the movie around him anyway. Hollywood humor could either save or ruin this.

"Dawson's Creek" fans should get their fill of the stars while the show is on summer hiatus. Michelle Williams (Jen) teams with Kirsten Dunst in the ill-titled Dick. The two absent-minded girls lose their way during a White

The jazz classics get good treatment

Jazz/Blues Weekly

By Charlie Apicella

The practice of reissuing classic jazz albums can be tricky business. Purists often do not support the idea of manipulating the overall sound or the presentation of the music in any way. This includes debates on the validity of alternate takes as well as digital remastering and remixing of recordings.

Another problem faced is that of reordering the tunes and inserting alternate takes into the body of a record as opposed to at the end of the original song order. This is an important aspect of the reissuing process in that it can greatly affect the listening of a record. Alternate takes inserted among the originally issued tunes can break the flow of music and distort the artist's original intention for the selection of tunes.

The newest reissuing project undertaken by Blue Note Records, The Rudy Van Gelder Editions, is a series of 24 classic Blue Note albums being released to celebrate the company's 60th anniversary. The direction taken on this reissuing project is very tasteful and straight forward. The CDs contain their original liner notes as well as direct and thorough re-examinations of the sessions by writer Bob Blumenthal. The discs themselves are remastered to pristine sound quality, and are free from any judgement flaws in track ordering and alternate take selection.

The series includes staple recordings such as Horace Silver's "Song For My Father," Lee Morgan's "The Sidewinder," Grant Green's "Idle Moments," as well as titles by Herbie Hancock and Tony Williams. Two of the key albums in this series are Art Blakey's "Moanin'," and a session led by Cannonball Adderley called "Somethin' Else" which features Miles Davis.

At the time of the recording of "Somethin' Else" in March of 1958, Adderley had recently joined Miles Davis' Quintet, and Davis clearly takes the leading role on this session. Miles is solely responsible for the heads of a number of the tunes, and often takes the initial solo on the tunes. Furthermore, the title track of the record is a tune written by him. In this recording the chemistry between Davis and Adderley is solid, but is only a hint of what would be heard in the coming months, as the formation of Miles' Sextet with Adderley and John Coltrane was only weeks away.

Art Blakey's "Moanin'" is a classic that defines the solid funk grooves of his music. Blakey's Jazz Messengers at the time included killer trumpeter Lee Morgan, tenor saxophonist Benny Golson, and hard-bop pianist Bobby Timmons, who wrote the title tune of the album. The ensemble drives throughout, and is held grounded by bassist Jymie Merritt.

Art's desire to always surround himself with young, aggressive innovators is very much reflected in the material of this album, as the brash virtuosity of Morgan, Timmons, and Golson are perfectly fueled by Blakey's energetic, fluid drumming. All of the tunes, except for Timmons' "Moanin'" and the standard "Come Rain or Come Shine" are written by Benny Golson. The bop "Are You Real" and the favorite "Along Came Betty" are Golson originals that sound as if they were written specifically for the interaction between himself and Lee Morgan. The chemistry and musical telepathy of this group is matchless, and the 24-bit digital remastering adds nicely to the depth and atmosphere of the recording.

Presently, most of the CDs in the Rudy Van Gelder Editions are available. The last group of recordings are scheduled for release by the end of Spring.

House tour and run into president Nixon (get it?) smack dab during Watergate.

Then, teen demigod and "Creek" creator Kevin Williamson takes his first shot at directing with Killing Mrs. Tingle. Although the horror king also penned the script, Tingle is a dark comedy about a future valedictorian handed a bad grade by an evil teacher and her plot for revenge. Of course, Williamson gets Katie Holmes ("Dawson's" Joey) to star with Helen Mirren, not to mention a cameo by Molly Ringwald. I can't wait.

As for those aforementioned gems, check out A Midsummer Night's Dream. With an all-star cast, including Michelle Pfeifer, Kevin Kline, Rupert Everett and Calista Flockheart, the exotic-looking romantic comedy looks to continue the popularity and quality of Shakespeare films. Remember Shakespeare in Love?

The equally impressive cast of John Travolta, James Woods, James Cromwell (LA Confidential), and Madeline Stowe takes this film adaptation of the book, The General's Daughter to theaters. Travolta plays an army officer investigating a murder and a mysterious sex-video tape in the midst of a high level government cover-up.

In a refreshing premise, The Blair Witch Project offers a new twist on the horror genre. Before you run for the hills, consider that this was a Sundance film. The story follows three Maryland students who are out to make a documentary about the local legend. They never return and a buried videotape is the only testament of their last days.

Fight Club promises a turbulent tale about violence, broken relationships, and the underground bar scene. Edward Norton, fresh off his Oscar nomination for American History X befriends sadomasochist, Brad Pitt, and falls for belle, Helena Bonham Carter. The bottom line is that Carter has never been in a bad movie and David Fincher who directed Pitt in Seven returns for this dark tale.

Oh, yeah, and I almost forgot some guy named Lucas is releasing an outer-space sci-fi flick. Some people think it might be pretty good.

transformation into Darth Vader. The Phantom Menace will set the stage for things to come in the next two installments; this one features a mentor Jedi Knight (Liam Neeson), his apprentice Obi-Wan (Ewan McGregor), a young queen (Natalie Portman), and a young boy destined for both greatness and a fall from grace.

The next installment, planned for a 2002 release, will be a love story as dark and depressing as Lucas can get, not vers. which is the real appeal of Star Wars. The battle between good and evil is never that dangerous of a battle. Sure, you might get your hand cut off once in a while, but you'll always be celebrating with a bunch of furry Ewoks in the end.

"Cultural experts" will talk about myths and folklore, but the real appeal is escapism. Something beyond getting depressed over failing your chemistry test. Star Wars is simply a re-hash of those old Saturday morning serials in the 40's that Lucas and Spielberg watched as kids. The Phantom Menace, in fact, takes its name from a Flash Gordon serial.

That's what made Star Wars such a risk back in the 70's — it was overly camp-, childish and cartoonish. Now, those faults are considered indispensable virtues.

Along with, of course, the technology. Face it, you also watch Star Wars over and over to see those special effects.

Back in the 70's (again), Lucas had to invent all new special effects and all new cameras just to get his ideas filmed. It's the same reason he waited so long to start the prequels; working on the post-production for Spielberg's Jurassic Park in 1993, he realized that the technology was finally there.

It's a safe bet that even the explicit previews and the pictures will be no sufficient preparation for the special effects in The Phantom Menace. They will be absolutely breathtaking, and no doubt, revolutionary.

The only question that really remains, then, is the amount of its success. History is working against it; in the past, cultural phenomena have come out of nowhere — Star Wars, E.T., Forrest Gump, Titanic. All were predicted to flop, whereas big hype movies like Godzilla fell flat.

But such questioning is silly. Star Wars is no Godzilla, and Lucas is certainly no Roland Emmerich. Lucas and his special effects company are Hollywood, are responsible for 95% of the fictional images you have witnessed in your lifetime.

He is the story teller to end all story tellers, so I have a feeling that this and million summers afterward, we'll never get tired of hearing about what happened a long time ago, in a galaxy far, far away.

Who knew that "Mike, you wanna go see a movie?" could contain so much import and gravity.

I can thank Empire Strikes Back for beginning my love of going to the movies — not renting them, or seeing them on pay-per-view — but actually going out on a night, with friends or alone, and experiencing the same emotions as the rest of the theater. And what better movie than that to start with?

I didn't see Star Wars until after the sequel, and I argued with my parents for months about the chronology of the series. It wasn't so much the plot that mattered to me, or even the fact that in my version of the series Lando Calrissian disappeared for a whole movie, right in the middle.

I remember my parents showing up early on my last day of kindergarten to take me to see Return of the Jedi, after pricing wood-burning stoves for our living room. Even watching my parents haggle over prices didn't ruin the magic of the Force. Or the startling realization that Luke and Leia were brother and sister (not sexy... not sexy at all).

That whole summer, I sat in my front yard trying to make a Sarlac Pit at the base of the oak tree that rests between our house and our neighbor's. I'd sit there and push daddy long legs down into the mud, pretending they were Boba Fett or some alien/villain. (There wasn't much else to do in my town other than hang out at the Oreland Market and give the finger to cars that have already passed.) I dreamt about fighting Darth Vader and The Emperor. I had every action figure — I sold my soul for an AT-AT and I thanked my grandfather every day for an Ewok village.

There are people already in line for The Phantom Menace. And if they have the time to do that, then God bless 'em, but just for karma's sake they should consider ringing a bell for the Salvation Army or mowing the lawns of their elderly neighbors after they see it for the millionth or so time. But what else in our culture can move people to do such a thing?

I guess that's the power of the whole Star Wars phenomenon — the ability to stir the imagination and actually inspire child-like awe in the young and old. When you get down to it, the movies are just fairy tales with some pretty wooden acting. But it was George Lucas' love of the movies, of swashbuckling epics and Kurosawa samurai pictures, that ended up appealing to everyone.

But we never realized that as kids — Like anyone of us had even heard of The Hidden Fortress, one of the inspirations for the first movie. The bottom line is that for most, if not all, twenty-somethings, the Star Wars trilogy is the defining moment of our childhood. It's nights in a cool, air-conditioned theater and warm afternoons with arms spread, flying around the front yard like an X-Wing fighter. It sparked our imagination like few things could.

Am I looking forward to The Phantom Menace? Hell yeah. I won't be sleeping outside the theater, but I'll be looking forward to opening day. I wasn't too excited until the second trailer started creeping into theaters, and then I sensed this swimming sense of joy and expectation that I used to know so well. I find it beautiful that The Empire Strikes Back introduced me to the joys of a darkened theater, and the new movie will help me usher in my adult, post-college life, like a sweet kiss goodbye to childhood.

not be presented in chronological order. The original films-A New Hope, The Empire Strikes Back and Return of the Jedi, are the middle of the saga. The Phantom Menace is the first in the series, which does not explain how everybody got those silly 1970's hairstyles.

Anyway, the story of the Phantom Menace revolves around young Anakin Skywalker. A cute little kid, he befriends Ben Kenobi, newly indoctrinated into the Jedi cult. Ben (now named Obi-Wan) starts to train the boy in the ways of the Jedi. When Obi-Wan gets a little too friendly with the boy, that's when Jedi Master Qui-Gon Jinn (Liam Neeson) and Yoda (Frank Oz) scorn Obi-Wan and confine him to be a hermit in Tantooine. Meanwhile young Anakin strikes up a romance with Queen Amidala (Natalie Portman) who is in the midst of acting as the commander-in-chief in the Clone wars, where the rebels are fighting off cloned sheep used as a tactical warfare device by the Empire. The Emperor wants to take over the entire galaxy for the express purpose of keeping all the Toll House cookies for himself.

The young Anakin, now going through puberty, learns to use the Force for slightly dishonest purposes, like fixing horse races and robbing the galaxy bank. This attracts the Emperor to the boy, and he sets a course for Alderan to turn the boy to the "dark side" of the Force. He succeeds, but it is too late. He has already knocked up Queen Amidala, spawning Luke, who will join Darth Vader to destroy the Emperor. So, in order to counteract his inevitable fate, the Emperor sends the T-1000 liquid metal Terminator back in time to destroy Queen Amidala. That's when C-muel L. Jackson saves the day. I don't want to give away the ending, but all ends up OK, and sets things up perfectly for the Star Wars we all know and love. Among the Star Wars characters we already know that will be making unnecessary appearances in The Phantom Menace are Jabba the Hutt, C-3PO and R2D2, Stormtroopers and that big monster thing that they parked the Millenium Falcon inside of in The Empire Strikes Back.

Details are sketchy about the next two films, but we know that episode II will not necessarily come before episode III. We do know that episode II will be brought to you by the letters "A" and "R" and the number 3.1425875795632. And each consecutive film will have more muppetts and more facial imagery (remember the final scene in Star Wars: A New Hope? When they give Luke, Han and Chewie the medals? Straight out of Triumph of the Will.), than the previous film. Stay tuned for more details.

NHL deals with the loss of Steve Chiasson
2nd round of playoffs set to start

The National Hockey League playoffs first round has come to a close and the teams have been reseeded for round two, yet none of the sweeps or upsets in round one are in the headlines this week. The story is that of the tragic death of Carolina Hurricanes defenseman Steve Chiasson, who rolled over his truck at 4 a.m. Monday morning.

While the NHL played on, on Tuesday, the loss of Chiasson was being felt all around the league. There was a memorial service for the 13-year veteran. It was an hour long and remember him as a determined and "zestful" player. He will be laid to rest on Saturday in his hometown of Peterborough, Ontario.

Hockey is such a rough sport on the ice that, many of us, as well as players, might also start feeling as if our heroes are invincible.

None of us could believe it when defenseman Vladimir Konstantinov of the Redwings was partially paralyzed due to a limousine accident after winning the Stanley Cup. The tragedy in Konstantinov's story is that he was celebrating the right way, he wasn't driving himself.

Chiasson's crash is being investigated as an alcohol-related accident. He leaves behind a wife and three kids, two boys and a girl — it makes one put into perspective how unimportant hockey is in comparison.

"To hear that and then have to come down to the rink and practice, you don't even feel like doing it. I guess hockey has it's importance to a point. This renders it all so insignificant. The thing that bothers me is that the next day, life goes on, hockey goes on, nothing ever stops," Chiasson's former teammate Steve Yzerman said.

One can never forget a similar tragedy around this same time. After posting a shutout in a National League Playoff game in 1986, Philadelphia Flyers Pelle Lindberg went out to celebrate, and he, too, crashed his car that night and lost his life. Lindberg was an All-star of the future, and created the style made famous by Dominik Hasek of modern-day goaltending.

The NHL will deal with it's loss as it has in the past, but this time it will be difficult, after all, we have a good six weeks of hockey left to play, and a tragedy like this one might haunt the playoffs as well as make it a difficult for players who knew and played with the 32-year-old Chaisson to continue.

• Despite the tragedy, NHL commissioner Gary Bettman has decided to let the games go on, and they did. As the first rounds finish up, there are certainly some surprises to talk about. Tuesday's results helped close out the first round, and set up the second round.

Paul Teves

The New Jersey Devils fell in game seven to the Pittsburgh Penguins 4-2, ending what has to be their most disappointing season ever. After all, the Devils went into the playoffs seeded No. 1 in the Eastern Conference and No. 2 overall in the NHL.

The other final from Tuesday included the St. Louis Blues completing a comeback from being behind three-games-to- one. It was a goal by Pierre Turgeon with 2:01 remaining in the overtime period that earned a 1-0 victory. Fuhr made 35 saves in a shutout performance.

• The final two spots earned. Now we can preview the second round — in the Eastern Conference. The Boston Bruins who advanced past the Hurricanes on the strength of Anson Carter's play, as he scored three goals and two assists. The Bruins get set to face Hasek and the Sabres.

The Sabres offense is still anemic with it's leading scorer being Michael Peca, who has scored one goal but contributed with five helpers. The story of the series has to be Hasek, who clearly outmatches Byron Dafoe. Hasek has played all of Buffalo's minutes and has a record of 4-0 in beating No. 2 Ottawa. He also has a 1.35 goals against average.

Dafoe has a 1.46 GAA, while only going 4-2 against one of the lesser teams in the conference. Their is no doubt Hasek is a better goalie and deserves the Vezina and the series, so look for the Bruins to have to solve Hasek in order to win. But don't expect them to have to score much either — that's the only reason why the Bruins have a chance; because Buffalo can't score.

• In Monday's action, the Toronto Maple Leafs ousted the Philadelphia Flyers, when Sergei Berezin scored with 59 seconds remaining in regulation. Now the Leafs prepare to face against Pittsburgh.

The Flyers were incensed on the call made by officials late in that game. Both Flyers chairman Ed Snider and coach Roger Neilson blasted Terry Gregson's officiating after the game and were fined a total of $75,000 by the NHL.

Simply stated, the Flyers season ended because their captain Eric Lindros wasn't playing. If he will need to figure out Joseph. Jagr has five points in his three games, while Straka has 11 points in seven games. The surprise for the Pens has to be Alexei Kovalev who has collected 10 points on four goals and six assists.

• In the Western conference, the major series is the one that involves the leagues No. 1 team, the Dallas Stars, and the St. Louis Blues. The Blues are coming off a stunning comeback against Phoenix, and will be tired, but hot. The Stars will look to continue their great play as they knocked off Edmonton in four straight games.

The Stars have been doing it on the strength of goalie Ed Belfour, who is 4-0 and has a 1.41 GAA. Mike Modano has averaged a point a game thus far in the playoffs for the Stars, but will look for Brett Hull to step it up against his former team.

Defenders like Chris Pronger and Al MacInnis will be looking to keep Hull off the scoreboard. Grant Fuhr will be a key in stopping Hull as well. Fuhr is 4-2 in the playoffs while collecting a 2.17 GAA. Pierre Turgeon and MacInnis are looking to improve on their combined 17 points in the first seven games.

• The most awaited series of the playoffs is the return date between the Detroit Redwings and the Colorado Avalanche. The Av's qualified for the second round of the playoffs after Rookie Milan Hejduk scored to give the 'Lanche a 3-2 win and a 4-2 series win. But the 'Lanche get set to face their long-term rivals in Detroit.

With the exception of last season the winner of the series was the eventual Stanley Cup Champion. In 1995-96 the Avalanche won and went onto the championship. In 1996-97 the Redwings won the hard fought six game series and advance to capture the cup. So look for this year's winner to do the same, if the Blues can give the Stars any type of fight.

The series was split 2-2 during the regular season and should provide for a great physical series, which is something these encounters never lack.

Theo Fleury is the new cog for the 'Lanche and will help them win the series as well as the Chiasson factor that might slow down long time Wings. The 5-6 winger for the Ave's is one of the feistiest players as much as he is fast and skilled in the NHL. The Avalanche paid a stiff price to acquire the 11-year veteran who has one Stanley Cup ring and has over 800 career points. He will be looked upon to help the 'Lanche tremendously in this series.

He sat out seven of the first eight games with the Av's with a sprained right knee, but has since been the impact player Colorado traded for. He has scored 10 goals and 15 assists in 25 games.

Fleury has continued to make an impact in the playoffs collecting 11 points in six games, but he is not the team's leading scorer in the postseason. That title belongs to Joe Sakic who has tallied 12 points, while Peter Forsberg and Hejduk have combined for 15 points of their own in the first six games. Chris Drury will also need to pick it up for Colorado if they expect to win this hard-hitting series.

"I'm really excited to play against the Redwings," Fleury said of playing in his first Av's/Redwings series. "I have to hear about it everyday."

Chris Osgood will be the major factor trying to stop these great scorers as he has a 1.50 GAA after the first four games against Tecmu Selanne and Paul Kariya.

• Finally, in other news outside the playoffs the NHL has decided to waive the waiting period and allow the NHL's greatest player, Wayne Gretzky to be allowed into the hall at the conclusion of this season.

Three spectators killed in racing accident in N.C.

By Joe Macenka
Associated Press

CONCORD, N.C. — With flags at half staff, Lowe's Motor Speedway returned to the business of racing Tuesday, holding a test for Winston Cup cars on the track where three spectators died last weekend.

More than two dozen teams from stock car racing's top circuit showed up for the start of the two-day test session, which had been scheduled well in advance of Saturday night's Indy Racing League event.

A three-car crash in that race at speeds near 215 mph sent a tire and suspension parts flying into the stands, killing three and injuring eight, including one critically.

The accident prompted speedway officials to consider canceling the Winston Cup test, but they elected to proceed mainly because the session, booked by General Motors for its teams, was closed to the public. No spectators were allowed in the stands.

"We felt it was in everybody's best interests to move on," track spokesman Jerry Gappens said.

Even as the test began, there were other reminders of the accident in addition to the lowered flags outside the track's main entrance. A sign advised tourists that daily speedway tours had been canceled this week. And yellow police-line tape still dangled from the center-aisle railing in the fourth-turn grandstand where the accident occurred.

Twenty minutes into the practice session, Michael Waltrip's Chevrolet spun violently through the third turn and slammed off the fourth-turn retaining wall, about 200 yards from where Saturday night's wreck occurred.

Waltrip wasn't injured, but the crash served as an eerie reminder of recent events.

"Our hearts go out to the folks who lost their lives and their families and the people who were injured," three-time Winston Cup champion Jeff Gordon said as he prepared to go out for his first test run. "But we know that Charlotte Motor Speedway, the IRL and really everybody in motorsports is going to come together and do whatever they can to improve the situation to make sure that doesn't happen again."

Saturday night's accident was the second in nine months involving multiple fan fatalities in U.S. racing. Both crashes occurred during Indy-car races when wheels and suspension parts snapped off cars and flew into stands.

Harvard downs UM losing streak extends to five

By Michael Kobylanski
Collegian Staff

With a 6-4 loss to Harvard University yesterday afternoon in Cambridge, the Massachusetts baseball team extended its losing streak to five games.

Ironically, the last team that the Minutemen (22-16, 10-5 in the Atlantic 10) defeated were the Crimson. That win came on April 27, as a 13-12 nail-biter in the semifinals of the Beanpot Tournament. Harvard improved to 26-15 with yesterday's victory.

UMass scored the game's first run in the top of the second off Crimson starter Mike Dryden. Two innings of work would be all that Dryden saw, as Harvard coach Joe Walsh used eight pitchers in the contest. The pitcher-by-committee method saw no pitcher go more then two innings, as was the case with Dryden.

The Crimson struck back for two in the home half of the fourth before the Minutemen regained the lead with two runs of their own in the top of the fourth.

The seesaw battle continued in the fifth, when Harvard crossed the plate twice and once again found itself ahead, this time by a 4-3 score. A single Crimson run in the bottom of the sixth put the hosts up 5-3 and signaled the end of the day for UMass starting pitcher Jesse Santos. The Chelmsford native went six innings, allowing five runs and eight hits while fanning two Harvard batters.

Not wanting to let the Crimson have all the fun, the Minutemen responded with a run in the top of the seventh to trim the Harvard advantage to 5-4. The Crimson, however, tallied a run of their own in the bottom of the eighth and closed the books on a 6-4 victory.

Donny Jamieson, the fourth Harvard pitcher of the afternoon, tossed a perfect fifth inning to earn his fifth win of the season against no defeats. Derek Lennon pitched a scoreless ninth inning to record the save.

Santos took the loss for the Minutemen to fall to 2-1 on the season, while Brian Blumsack hurled the final two innings, allowing only one run and one hit.

Freshman catcher Chris Morgan led the UMass offensive attack by going 3-for-3 with two runs scored and an RBI. One of those hits was his fourth home run of the season.

Nick Gorneault added his third longball of the year, while Bryan Mazzaferro, Aaron Braunstein, Gavin Clark and Seth Kaplan also chipped in hits for the Minutemen.

On the Harvard side of things, third baseman Hal Carey was the big star of the day. He went 2-for-4 with four RBI, with both of those hits being homeruns. Faiz Shakir also contributed two hits for the Crimson after coming off the bench midway through the ballgame.

The Minutemen will now look to snap the aforementioned losing streak this afternoon when they travel to Loudonville, NY to face Siena College. The two teams were originally supposed to play Tuesday, but the game was postponed to today because of rain.

Minutemen Notes: Freshman outfielder Mike Kulak returned to the UMass lineup yesterday after missing the past five games with a hamstring injury. Kulak went 0-for-3 with a walk while batting out of the leadoff spot.

Kevin O'Connell and the UMass Baseball team played Harvard in Cambridge yesterday afternoon.

come to watch her grace the mound. One can seldom sit in the stands of Totman Field while she is pitching, and fail to find members from a local high-school team looking on.

And Henderson appreciates the fan following, which she has watched steadily increase over her four seasons with the Minutewomen. Her team first grabbed local acclaim with a trip to the College Softball World Series in 1997. After another bid last spring, UMass has become a household team for softball followers in New England. Henderson appreciates the fan support, which is one of the reasons that she feels compelled to give something to the community in return.

When she glanced along the periphery of the softball diamond last Sunday, with nearly 1,100 people looking on, Henderson was extremely touched — mostly by the children who watched, hand-in-glove, admiring some of the best softball in the nation.

"Everybody loved it," she said. "We appreciate it so much because we never had this before until recently. I know what it's like looking up to other athletes. I know how I would want them to act towards me. I think everbody has that same mentality about the kids. We just really appreciate them being there."

Little Alicia Gardner was one of those children. She had sat through two games of enormous significance, and witnessed Henderson break the national record for consecutive scoreless innings pitched. She also saw the streak come to an end three innings later.

But it didn't matter. She was there because Henderson is her role model... and now, her special friend.

The legacy of Danielle Henderson

Pitching legend embraced by local communities

By Aaron Saykin
Collegian Staff

Nine-year-old Alicia Gardner was dragging her tiny feet behind the back-stop of Totman softball field. She labored to carry a bottle of water in her right hand that seemed to be heavier than her entire body.

Her four-foot frame slowly turned toward the towering Danielle "Harry" Henderson, who was preparing to throw her blazing fastball past a Virginia Tech batter.

"C'mon Harry," Gardner shouted in her mightiest voice.

Back she went to the bleacher seats to watch her idol wrap up the conference title for UMass by winning two games of a double-header against the Hokies.

But Gardner had another agenda for her trip to Amherst. Her mother drove her from Athol so she could have a reunion with Henderson. She had met Harry once before, some 20 months ago. And for both, the first meeting was too memorable to forget.

At the time, a seven year-old version of Gardner was too young to attend the UMass softball camp, and jealous that her older sister was not. Her sister was of age to learn from the Minutewomen softball stars, namely Henderson. So she sat at home the entire week burning with envy.

But the young softball afficionado clung to a morsel of hope, knowing that she would wait for her sister outside of the camp on the last day — when she planned to make her move and take Henderson by the horns.

And she did. She went right for Henderson. No hesitation. Not while she was vying for the attention of a softball goddess, whose career statistics and selfless personality will back up all diety claims. Trying to hide her age, Gardner approached Henderson and promptly asserted that she, too, was a pitcher.

> "That's how people helped me... They always seemed to go out of their way to help me learn and its only right to give back the help they gave to me."

Henderson wasn't fooled by the girl's mature bravado, but has always had a passion for working with little children. With no incentive other than the reward of generosity, Henderson gave a young child something to cherish, and something any little girl would hold dear to her heart for years to come. "Harry" brought Gardner out to the field, and let the seven year-old pitch to her.

"She was too young for camp, but she came the last day," Henderson remembered. "She said she was a pitcher and I caught for her. She was the cutest little thing. She was like a little fireball who just wanted to play."

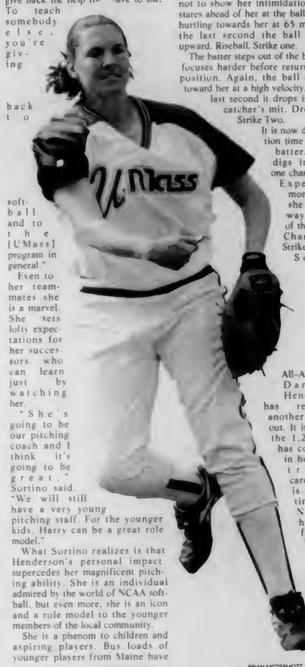
The reunion was also special — special for both parties. After Henderson finished pitching her second game last Sunday, Gardner found her way out onto the field. She had replaced the large bottle of water in her hand with a newspaper page. On the sheet was a color photo of Henderson. The same little girl who once pitched to the UMass athletic legend was hoping for an autograph.

Not only did Henderson gladly sign it, but she also immediately remembered Gardner, nearly two years removed from their first meeting.

For the strikeout queen of the Minutewomen, this moment planted a small seed of sorts in her mind. She had always enjoyed working with little children, and began to see a clearer future. Henderson had already committed herself to a particular task after she graduates from UMass this month, and almost immediately, that task began to seem more and more right in her head.

She has decided to stay with the Minutewomen and their skipper Elaine Sortino as a pitching coach for the spring of 2000 team.

"That's how people helped me," Henderson said. "They always seemed to go out of their way to help me learn and its only right to give back the help they gave to me. To teach somebody else, you're giving back to softball and to the [UMass] program in general."



Even to her teammates she is a marvel. She sets lofty expectations for her successors, who can learn just by watching her.

"She's going to be our pitching coach and I think it's going to be great," Sortino said. "We will still have a very young pitching staff. For the younger kids, Harry can be a great role model."

What Sortino realizes is that Henderson's personal impact supercedes her magnificent pitching ability. She is an individual admired by the world of NCAA softball, but even more, she is an icon and a role model to the younger members of the local community.

She is a phenom to children and aspiring players. Bus loads of younger players from Maine have

UMass ace holds all the records

By Matt Frascella

The batter steps into the small chalk box drawn on the dirt and tries not to show her intimidation. She stares ahead of her at the ball that is hurtling towards her at 65 mph. At the last second the ball jumps upward. Riseball. Strike one.

The batter steps out of the box and focuses harder before returning to position. Again, the ball speeds toward her at a high velocity. At the last second it drops into the catcher's mit. Dropball. Strike Two.

It is now desperation time for the batter. She digs in with one chance left. Expecting more heat, she swings way ahead of the pitch. Changeup. Strike Three. Senior All-American Danielle Henderson has recorded another strikeout. It is one of the 1,251 she has collected in her illustrious career. She is 3rd all time in NCAA history for K's. The No. 2 record holder should beware, because "Harry" Henderson's career is not over yet.

As a junior she led the nation in K's with 430. This year, she has already fanned 375 opponents in 184 innings of work; that equates to more than 2 strikeouts per inning.

Her domination of opponents is unmatched in softball. Last weekend, Henderson eclipsed a mark that is unthinkable: she went 105 consecutive innings without letting a runner cross the plate. That breaks an NCAA record that has stood for fifteen years.

Her ERA of 0.30 is second-best in the nation. The only pitcher with a better ERA is Amanda Scott from defending national champion Fresno State. Earlier this year, Harry showed Fresno State and the nation that UMass is a contender by beating Scott head-to-head in a 1-0 extra inning decision, out-dueling her respective opponent.

Perhaps her greatest achievement — perhaps even the greatest individual achievement in UMass sports history — came on a fateful day two years ago. Sophomore Danielle Henderson pitched three games in one day in the NCAA tournament and won all three to send Massachusetts to the World Series.

Three games back-to-back-to-back in the NCAA Regional. In game one, Henderson beat Boston College 4-1. Next came game two against No. 10 Colorado State — the Colorado State team that had shutout Henderson and the Minutewomen the day before. Harry beat them two times in a row. Game two even went into extra innings.

"We were in the losers bracket and Colorado State was winning," she said. "We had to beat them twice in one day. I didn't care. It was the best feeling ever. I will never forget those wins. We came from behind."

"I looked at Harry [after the second game] and said, 'can you go again?'" Sortino remembers. "[Put the ball in my hand' [was her reaction] Where else would I put it? She gets stronger in the eighth [inning of the final and deciding game]. We hold them in the eighth. It was like a movie. It was like one of those things on Walt Disney. Harry's effort was incredible."

From that day on, Harry has only gotten better. Realizing that her riseball pitch was not enough, she proceeded to add other pitches to her repertoire. Now a complete pitcher, she has command of a riseball, a dropball and a changeup in addition to her fastball.

"All she had [when she came to UMass] was a fastball," Sortino said. "As hard as she throws, you can just time and hit her. It was critical for her to mature. [Now] She'll come at you with the changeup. The development of the drop ball has been critical."

Henderson's maturity as a hurler is evident in the fact that she holds almost every pitching record in UMass history. In a single seven inning game she has fanned 18 batters. In a five inning game she has gotten 14 K's; all but one out via strikeout. She has the lowest ERA, the most games and innings pitched. In addition, she has thrown 69 shutouts, and won 103 games. She has thrown 15 no-hitters and an astonishing 3 perfect games.

She would have had another perfect game this year against Vermont, but the first batter of the game hit a dribbler back to the pitcher's mound that Danielle fielded and threw to first base. Ironically, her throw was off target — too low — and she was charged with an error. That was the only Catamount player to touch the basepaths. She is so talented that she throws no-hitters like they are shutouts, and perfect games like no-hitters.

For as great as she is on the pitcher's mound, she is equally as humble. The Commack, N.Y. native cares little for the records that are amassing with every game she throws. All she cares about is that her team wins.

"As of now I only want to be concerned with playing and winning," Harry said. "None of that matters. I don't care if I had the record for every single category. If we don't win the A-10's it would mean nothing to me."

"She doesn't care," Sortino said. "In spite of all these records the only thing that matters to Harry is that UMass has one more run than the other team when the game is over, again?" Sortino remembers. "Put the ball in my hand' [was her reaction] Where else would I put it? She gets stronger in the eighth [inning of the final and deciding game]. We hold them in the eighth. It was like a movie. It was like one of those things on Walt Disney. Harry's effort was incredible."

"Our goal is to go back to Oklahoma and win," Henderson said. "Anything can happen. We have to take it day-by-day."

"What do I say about her?" Sortino said. "She is a franchise. I know what she wants to do, and its not about streaks, strikeouts — its about winning. I know what her dreams are. Her heart is as big as her body."

One journalist's determined effort to get the great Danielle Henderson to keep pitching for UMass

Seth Koenig

There must be a way.

Right now, there should be some sort of brain trust diligently working on the possibility of keeping Danielle Henderson playing for the Massachusetts softball team.

Yes, she's graduating. Yes, it would seem nearly impossible to convince the NCAA that she should get a year back, because she's pitched every year she's been here, but we must try.

In 1996, as a freshman, she pitched enough to be Atlantic 10 Rookie of the Year, A-10 tournament MVP, and an All-Conference, All-New England and All-Northeast selection.

COURTESY MEDIA RELATIONS

Danielle Henderson 1997

Rookie. She'd learn the tricks of the trade eventually.

Like the next year, in 1997, when she took her 0.96 first- year ERA and dropped it to 0.80, added third-team All- America, World Championship of Women's Softball All- Tournament, NCAA Regional MVP and Atlantic 10 Pitcher of the Year honors to her resume. And you thought she won it all her first year.

And then she was a junior in 1998... blah blah blah... A- 10 title, a second consecutive World Series appearance, UMass records blown away and all sorts of things.

This year, 1999, she moved into the top five in NCAA history in strikeouts, broke the national record for most consecutive innings without allowing a run (105), got two turtle doves and a partridge in a pear tree.

So, you see, she must not be allowed to leave.

Sure, she might want to leave, but we can remedy that problem by offering her obscene amounts of cash to stay. $2.5 million a season might do the trick, for instance. We could tell the government Director Bob that she's being used for physics experiments and secret military testing.

Wait until the foreign dictators get a Henderson fastball in the kisser. If you think we have the largest military in the world now, you ain't seen nothing. The sound barrier? Whatever.

And that's the thing about Danielle; she's multi-purposed! She throws perfect games, wins awards, assassinates ruthless tyrants, slices, dices, and squeezes fresh oranges into a healthy drink! For just $2.5 million a year, UMass can get all that plus a national championship in the sport of softball, the Amazing Sandwich Maker and a revolutionary new dandruff shampoo!

Or maybe just Danielle. I think just Danielle would be better.

With No. 44 on the mound, you don't need all that much else — including, say, a second run. Between March 16 and May 2, every team that Henderson faced was shut out. The Minutewomen have a great offense, but, quite frankly, they don't really need it.

Maybe her teammates feel resentful of this. Maybe that's why they decided to try and insult her with the nickname "Harry," after the Big Foot-type creature who was adopted by a suburban family in the corny feel-good cinema flop called Harry and the Hendersons. It really has nothing to do with the fact that her name is "Henderson" like the family in the flick, it really has everything to do with the fact that they wanted to try and berate her.

Probably not though, as Henderson bears no likeness to that animal. A.) Danielle is obviously female. B.) Danielle could smoke Big Foot in a pitchers' duel. C.) Danielle needs to be paid $2.5 million dollars a year to play at UMass, whereas Big Foot doesn't exist. The differences are quite glaring.

Still, there remains the problem of NCAA eligibility that I digressed from just under 10 lines into the column.

There's the diplomatic appeal avenue, wherein Massachusetts Athletic Marcum puts together some absurd document that proves that Henderson never actually played here. All those school records? An android created by the biology and engineering departments at the university was created to dominate the sport of softball.

"Are you kidding," Marcum would say. "A human being would never be able pull off statistics like that!"

"He's got a point," the shady, dark-suited guys from the NCAA would say.

If that didn't work, there's still the journalistic integrity avenue:

Please please please please please!

Students, staff appointed to admissions task force

By Danielle Fugazy
Collegian Staff

In the wake of the changes in the admissions practices, the University of Massachusetts has announced that 20 members of the UMass community will serve on a new campus-wide Undergraduate Admissions Task Force.

According to a press release from the UMass News Office, Chancellor David K. Scott asked Provost Cora B. Marrett and Interim Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs Javier Cevallos to appoint a task force, because the change in the admission practices may reduce the number of students of color in the incoming class.

The goal of the task force is to review all aspects of the admissions process and to develop concrete steps for reaching the goal of recruiting and graduating an undergraduate student body that reflects the diversity of the state's high school students.

The task force will review all aspects of the undergraduate admissions process and develop proposals for improving the outreach, recruitment and yield of all students, Cevallos said in the press release.

He further stated that the task force will review statutory and case law; trustee policy, including accountability standards; campus enrollment planning parameters; and Board of Higher Education admission standards.

Janice Hanson, a professor of communications, and student Monique DeLaOz will be co-chairing the task force. Other students that were appointed include Linda Accime, Malcolm Beckwith, Jeff Belizaire, Monica Chiericl, Cori Daddabbo, Rachael Devaney and Student Government Association President Jeffrey Howe.

Faculty and staff members include: Robert M. Cotrell, economics; Sidonio D. "Sid" Ferreira, University Store; Preston C. Green III, School of Education; Pamela Marsh- Williams, Undergraduate Advising Center; Gerald A. Quarles, Student Affairs; Susan Pearson, associate chancellor; Janet Rifken, legal studies; Melvin Rodriguez, director of Diversity in Management Education Services, Isenberg School of Management; Charlene M. Seymour, graduate dean; Manitha Sinha, Afro-American studies; and John G. Stoffolano, entomology.

Cevallos asked the task force to try to complete its work by November 1, and the group has already begun to meet. Its first meeting, held May 4, was described as "fairly productive" by Hanson.

According to the press release, Hanson said the group will meet again after finals are over, probably during the first week of June.

UMass lacrosse player dies

Eric Sopracasa is struck by ball during practice

Eric Sopracasa, 21, of 33 Neil Dr., Farmingville, N.Y., died unexpectedly Wednesday evening as a result of an injury sustained during a Massachusetts men's lacrosse team practice.

Sopracasa was a junior apparel marketing major who spent the fall semester working an internship at Disney World.

He was in his third season as a member of the UMass lacrosse team, for which he was the starting longstick midfielder.

A graduate of Sachem High School, he was a Lehigh school All- American and an invitee to the Junior World Team tryouts.

According to the UMass News Office, Sopracasa was hit on the chest with a ball during a practice on the Lower Boyden Fields.

He collapsed and stopped breathing.

He was revived briefly and taken to Cooley Dickinson Hospital where he was later pronounced dead.

A statement issued last night by UMass News Director Kay Scanlan said that medical tests to fully determine the cause of Sopracasa's death could take weeks.

"Preliminary reports from the medical examiner indicate the death appears to have occurred due to accidental blunt force to the chest," the statement said. "Further tests are being conducted, including lab tests, which may take several weeks to complete."

Sopracasa is survived by his parents, Ernest and Marie; a younger brother and a younger sister.

Funeral arrangements have not been released.

Yesterday afternoon, flowers were placed at the midfield, face-off mark at Richard F. Garber Field in memory of Sopracasa.

Chaplains and counselors are available as needed to supports all members of the campus community by calling the Dean of Students Office at 545-2684.

Students express anger at parking fee increase

By Laura Forster and Jake Lilien
Collegian Staff

Inclement weather yesterday prevented University of Massachusetts student leaders from holding a rally opposing the recent decision to increase parking fees.

The UMass Republican Club, University Democrats and the Pro-Student Caucus, a committee within the Student Government Association, have decided instead to hold the rally on Wednesday, May 12 at noon on the Student Union steps.

The University Parking Services has recently announced its decision to increase some of the parking fees by 400 percent over the next two years in order to pay for repairs to the Campus Center Garage and Yellow Parking Lots.

On April 14, the Student Government Association passed a motion from Administrative Affairs Committee Chairman Mike Billard, opposing the increases.

In addition to condemning the University's decision, the motion requested that a representative from Parking Services appear before the SGA to explain the increases. To date, Parking Services has not responded to the request.

Now that the prices have been officially set, students have decided to hold a rally expressing their outrage.

"[The three groups] have come together for a single purpose," Billard said, "to bring everyone together in fighting against the increases."

"This is not a political issue," said Mike Marin, a former Vice-President of the Republican Club, explaining why groups from across the political spectrum have joined forces.

"We just want to voice our opinion," he said. "The students do not like this. We've got to tell the administration this is unreasonable. Some people can't afford to pay $40 for a parking permit."

Over the next two years, the price of yellow lot parking permit stickers will increase from $10, to $20, to $40. Purple parking stickers will rise in cost from $30, to $60, to a scale of $55-90 ($65 for students).

Both the UMass Republican Club and the University Democrats say they are angered with Campus Service Director Sandra Anderson, who at one point justified the increase by saying, "[The increase] isn't going to kill anybody."

Anderson also responded to a claim that Parking Services was trying to price students out of lots by saying, "If we were trying to [out-price them], we'd raise the prices to $500."

"This blatant disregard for the students' interests angered many," said the two student groups in a rare joint press release. "The administration has repeatedly proven that they do not hold the students' best interests at heart."

"Being a person who has a car, I don't want to be paying $40 in two years," said Marin.

NATO losing battle against ethnic cleansing

By Jeffrey Ulbrich
Associated Press

BRUSSELS, Belgium — NATO said yesterday it is well on its way to pounding Serb forces in Kosovo into ineffectiveness, but acknowledged it has failed to stop Yugoslav President Slobodan Milosevic's ethnic cleansing campaign.

Assessing the operation so far, an alliance general said Yugoslav forces in Kosovo were "being taken apart bit by bit," and offered a detailed list of successful strikes — including heavy artillery, tanks, command posts, as well as Serb army and special police units.

"We have all but entirely pinned them down," Maj. Gen. Walter Jertz told reporters at a NATO briefing. "They can no longer move with impunity... They can only move furtively and with great fear."

Nonetheless, Milosevic's forces have succeeded in driving out 675,000 people, mostly ethnic Albanians, since the air campaign began March 24, according to the U.N. High Commissioner for Refugees. Hundreds of thousands more remain in the province in terrible conditions.

"It's true, we have not been able to succeed in what was our initial objective, stopping the ethnic cleansing," said NATO spokesman Jamie Shea. "Then it's all the more reason to go for the next logical objective, which is to say, fine, we couldn't stop it happening, but my God, we are going to make that man pay a price for what he's done. A very heavy price."

On Tuesday, the head of NATO's military arm, Gen. Klaus Naumann, said that although the campaign had slowed ethnic cleansing, "we cannot stop such a thing entirely from the air."

NATO's principal goal is taking out the Serb forces in Kosovo to protect the population and allow the return of refugees to the southern province of Serbia, whose original population of 2 million was 90 percent ethnic Albanian.

In the six weeks of the air campaign, strikes in Kosovo have hit eight battalion-brigade command posts, destroyed an estimated 50 percent of ammunition storage, and blasted more than 300 individual pieces of military equipment, Jertz said.

Clinton visits refugees housed in Germany, promises their return

By Terrance Hunt
Associated Press

INGELHEIM, Germany — Listening to chilling stories of murder, rape and terror, President Clinton promised refugees yesterday, "You will go home again in safety and in freedom." He said that with Russian agreement on a common approach in Kosovo "a real peace process" has begun.

A refugee driven from her village of Dervar told Clinton that ethnic Albanian women dared not have their babies at state-run hospitals. "They would kill the babies, especially the baby boys," she said. Her own son was born at home on the night NATO airstrikes began, March 24.

Women also told of putting mud on their faces to repel would-be Serb rapists. "They killed my brother and his son, two of my nephews," an elderly woman told the president, whose eyes grew moist.

Clinton declared, "The world will hear your stories." The president concluded a fast-paced trip to NATO's headquarters and Germany as Western allies and Russia agreed on the outlines of a peace formula for Kosovo. Moscow, for the first time, endorsed deployment of an international security force to oversee the peaceful return of refugees.

"This is a significant step forward," Clinton said during a stop in Bonn for talks with Chancellor Gerhard Schroeder, whose center-left governing coalition has been shaken by Germany's first combat since World War II. Schroeder called the agreement with Russia "truly substantial progress."

"I think there is a real peace process under way," Clinton said, "but it has no chance of reaching a satisfac-

Researchers find gene that launches infections

By Paul Recer
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — In a discovery that could lead to powerful new vaccines and antibiotics, researchers have isolated a key gene that bacteria use to launch killer infections.

Researchers at the University of California, Santa Barbara, have demonstrated in laboratory studies that removing or inactivating a gene called DAM can disarm a strain of salmonella, bacteria that cause food poisoning in humans.

"We've uncovered a genetic master switch that controls bacterial infection," said Dr. Michael J. Mahan, the study's lead author and a UCSB professor. "When we knock out this switch, the bacterium is completely disabled in its ability to cause disease."

The study is to be published today in the journal Science. Mahan said the DAM gene was found through a five-year process of examining bacterial genes that are turned on at the start of an infection in a host animal. Often these genes are quiet in laboratory dishes and go into action only when the pathogen is starting an infection inside an animal.

"Bacterial pathogens act like a Trojan horse — they hide their weapons until they are within an animal," said Mahan. As a result, some bacterial genes that cause infection "are turned on inside a mouse and off outside a mouse," he said.

The UCSB researchers, using salmonella, found that the DAM gene made a protein that turned on other genes that started the infection process.

When strains of salmonella were created that permanently disabled the DAM gene, the microbe could not cause disease in mice. The altered bacteria also acted like a vaccine, causing the mouse's immune system to make antibodies that would attack salmonella, said Mahan.

"Mice immunized with this crippled strain of salmonella were completely protected from infection," he said. Some of the mice were injected with a salmonella dose 10,000 times more powerful than a dose that is lethal to half of all mice. None of the animals developed disease, said Mahan.

There are 2,500 strains of salmonella that cause diseases ranging from food poisoning to typhoid fever. Poorly cooked poultry and eggs are a common source of salmonella food poisoning, and some experts have estimated that up to 4 million Americans are affected annually.

A variety of other bacteria pathogens, including cholera, plague and Shigella dysentery, also have DAM genes, raising the possibility that those diseases could also be disabled by blocking DAM.

Mahan said it may be possible to make an antibiotic based on the DAM gene. If a chemical could be found that blocks the action of the protein made by DAM, then it might prevent bacteria from continuing the infection process, he said.

"This is a breakthrough discovery," said Dr. Philip Hanna, a microbiologist at Duke University Medical Center. "They have found a master switch that turns on virulence."

If further study proves that disabling the DAM genes will protect humans from bacterial infection, it could lead to a new class of antibiotics and to a new type of vaccine, Hanna said. But Dr. Regina Rabinovich, a scientist at the National Institute of Allergy and Infectious Diseases, a part of the National Institutes of Health, cautioned that the value of the DAM research will not be known until it is tested and proven to work in humans. "The mouse has not been a very good model for what will happen with salmonella in humans," said Rabinovich.

Refugee baby born in New Jersey

By Linda A. Johnson
Associated Press

MOUNT HOLLY, N.J. — A Kosovo refugee gave birth to an instant American citizen yesterday, a day after she was airlifted to safety from the Balkans, and her husband wants to name the baby "America."

The 7-pound, 8-ounce boy was born to Lebibe Karaliju, 21, and her husband, Naim, 28, at Virtua Health Memorial Hospital. It was the couple's first child.

Dr. Michael T. Snyder, who delivered the full-term baby, said mother and child were doing fine, though Mrs. Karaliju was exhausted and dehydrated, and the baby was placed in a special nursery as a precaution. They were expected to remain in the hospital for at least two days.

The Karalijus were among 453 refugees from Kosovo who arrived at Fort Dix on Wednesday in the first planeload to be brought to the United States. The refugees will stay at the Army base for a few weeks while they are placed with families around the country. Mrs. Karalija had been taken to the hospital on a stretcher after her arrival in the United States because she appeared to be dehydrated.

A child born on U.S. soil is automatically an American citizen. During a news conference at the hospital, Karalija said through a translator he is glad his son is a U.S. citizen and would like to name him America, but he would have to discuss the idea with his wife first.

"It is kind of a new start," he said of their arrival in the United States.

The couple fled their home in Urosevac — a village of 300 people 22 miles from the Kosovo capital, Pristina — to a refugee camp in Macedonia after learning that an aunt and uncle had been killed by Serb forces.

Karalija said when they arrived at the camp, a doctor examined Mrs. Karaliju and predicted she would give birth yesterday. He said he would like his family to return eventually.

tory conclusion unless we maintain allied unity and firmness. I don't think the process is long, but I don't think we can afford to be discouraged or be impatient."

However, the accord with Russia was not specific about the type of security presence and did not embrace the West's insistence that NATO troops play the dominant role, National Security Adviser Sandy Berger acknowledged. Even so, Berger said, "We're a lot closer than we were."

The Russians coming on board — after weeks of their siding with Yugoslavia in opposition to an international military force — was an important step, Clinton said, "and I was personally very pleased by it."

Even as the diplomacy accelerated, the Pentagon announced that NATO is expanding its attack range. Spokesman Kenneth Bacon said eight U.S. Air Force refueling planes are due to arrive in Hungary this week. He would not comment further, but other officials, speaking privately, said 24 Marine Corps F-A-18 Hornet attack planes also will be based in Hungary as part of a broader buildup of American and NATO air power on the periphery of Serbia.

"I think you'll find when it's together and announced that we will have basically a 360-degree attack capability against Yugoslavia," Bacon said. He added that even as the diplomacy progresses, NATO's air campaign will intensify.

Earlier, Clinton visited Ingelheim — a town known for its red wine — to visit 354 Kosovo refugees housed in wood-frame barracks at a facility originally built for juvenile delinquents. In interviews, some refugees said they were bored, spending their days listening to the radio and television, reading newspapers and playing table tennis.

They said they hope NATO stages a ground invasion, and they looked forward to returning home — but not under Serb rule. On a chilly afternoon under gray skies, the president spoke to refugees on a grassy plot between buildings. He pledged that allied forces would prevail over Yugoslav President Slobodan Milosevic and force Serb troops from Kosovo.

"You must know that you have not been forgotten or abandoned," the president said. "Mr. Milosevic has not succeeded in erasing your identity from the pages of history, and he will not succeed in erasing your presence from the land of your parents and grandparents. You will go home again in safety and in freedom." He visited the dormitory quarters of a family of seven adults and two children whose room was equipped with black metal bunk beds and metal lockers.

"We were chased from our homes," said Sabit Salihu, 60, a compact man with facial stubble and a beret. "My home was burned. We were beaten. Everything was stolen from us." As he spoke to Clinton, Salihu began to cry. His nephew told of young people being shot and girls being raped.

Quotable Quotes

Well, this year has nearly come to its end and this will be the last time my ugly mug will be on this page until next year (cue sad music). Don't grab your tissues quite yet though, all is not lost. At UMass and in the public eye we seem to have a large number of people with foot-in-mouth disease. These are the people who find something weird, wacky or downright scary to say in public. Our esteemed chancellor, David K. Scott, is among them along with a number of the leadership in the Republican Club, the President of the United States and everyday folks like you and me. I have compiled a list of some of the statements that have made this year at UMass a memorable one for me and the rest of campus.

Brian Lohnes

At a recent meeting with the Republican club, Chancellor Scott was quoted as saying, "You can't just say, 'This person is totally gay' or 'This person is totally heterosexual,' We all have elements of heterosexuality and homosexuality. There's a whole spectrum." Talk about a nasty mental picture.

At that same meeting, grad student Ed Cutting said, "I believe that being a conservative on this campus is like being a Communist during the McCarthy regime." Can you say paranoid?

"The Minute Man," which I must stress is not a Republican Club publication, contained enough wacky stuff that it was hard to narrow it down. Brandon Beane wrote about Charles Manson and President Bill Clinton saying, "It is quite possible as a result of both men's noted promiscuity, that unknown numbers of offspring litter the nation." Where have Jenny Jones and Jerry Springer been on this? I smell a DNA test.

"You are all going to Hell!" — Quote from the religious fanatic that stopped by with his family a few times this year. I didn't find this to be a very good way to win over an audience.

"Randy is out hunting" — Quote from the clerk at Randy's Guns and Ammo and Mobil in Vermont. Yes folks, it's a real place. I've been there.

"I am fighting for the rights of all European-Americans" — Quote from David Duke on his platform for the election in his district in Louisiana. Duke thankfully lost the election. Scarily enough he finished third.

"I did not have improper sexual relations with that woman." — Quote from "Wild Bill" Clinton on his relationship with a certain intern. And you thought you had heard the last of that.

"I want to tell you guys that I started smoking to now I can hang out with you on the balcony." — Overheard in Grayson. Sounds like a good enough reason for me.

"I am a walking billboard for absolutely nothing" — Overheard in Franklin Dining Commons. I myself am a billboard for Coca Cola products, but that's just me.

"Screw writing letters, we're going to his house!" — Quote from Michael Moore after a member of GEO asked him to write a letter to the Chancellor about child care. Too bad that didn't happen — it would have been cool to see Chancellor Scott in a robe chasing pesky protestors away from his house that night.

"Impeach Clinton!" — Quote from one of the several rousing Republican Club impeachment rallies. Hopefully next year these guys can buy a speaker system that can't be unplugged.

"I was captured in a Star Wars blanket and thrown down the hill" — Quote overheard at Bowl Day. This may be an unexpected side effect from the release of the new movie George Lucas better have his lawyers ready.

"Winning isn't everything, but it sure makes the best taste better!" — Quote overheard in Webster. Didn't Shakespeare say that?

"The world would be a happier place if people shacked more." — Quote overheard at frat party. Ain't that the truth.

"Zebulon? Isn't that like a planet or something?" — Quote from my girlfriend Kerri as we passed Zebulon, South Carolina on our way to Florida during spring break. Yes, it too is a real place and the best part is it's in South Carolina.

"God used to be my co-pilot; unfortunately we crashed into the mountains and I had to eat him." — Quote from a bumper sticker I saw in Amherst center. I know that it's gross, sick and twisted, but that's the best part.

"Bruiser Flint is a great coach!" — Quote overheard after the UMass men's basketball team's woeful performance against Fordham University. Anyone who can spell their own name knows that Bruiser couldn't couch his way out of a wet paper bag.

I hope that you enjoyed this smattering of quotes from this memorable year at UMass. I hope everyone has a happy, safe and fun-filled summer and to the seniors I wish you good luck in the future. Fortunately for the rest of us, we have at least one more year before we have to enter reality. I will be spending my summer locked in my bedroom thinking about new columns for next year. Farewell for now.

"Don't forget to get your pets spayed and neutered" — Quote from Bob Barker at the end of every episode of "The Price is Right." I don't know about everyone else, but that ruins the show for me every time.

A strong foundation

The end of the school year is upon us. Some students are busy studying for exams. Others are making plans to go home to their families. Still others are outside, playing volleyball and frisbee and all those other leisure sports associated with the summertime. They laugh, they cry. They look ahead to new memories, new friendships and new experiences.

A half-empty glass of liquor sits on my desk. Sitting in my room, I am pondering the mistakes of the semester. I sit in my creaky wooden chair and think of what a waste the past few months have been. Alas, the demons that were buried so long ago find new life in my self-pity.

I remember the beginning of the semester vividly. I went to frat parties. I drank recklessly, and I had a really great time. The only things I knew were happiness and cheer. My grades were not a concern, as I was so enveloped in frivolity that I forgot the true reason I came to this school.

I picture my parents, slaving away at work so that I can go to a universities and find the opportunities that they did not, to have a better life than they did. I am failing miserably, not just in terms of academics but also in my responsibilities to my family.

Perhaps I was adopted. for I could never see my father being as lazy as I. My mother would never let something as foolish as matters of the heart interfere with her schooling, her ticket to happiness and accomplishment. But then again, they are not spoiled. They have not had the opportunity to squander their chances.

There is one tenet to college life, one that I as a student have yet to grasp. You will not read about this guideline in any book, nor will you hear some stuffy professor dictate this rule to his pupils. Nonetheless, it remains a reality. Academic success at a university is impossible without social stability.

Bill Larkin

What is social stability? It is not something that you can buy, nor is it something that comes with exercise. It comes only with maturity and self-confidence. It comes from facing confrontations and dealing with them appropriately. It comes from accepting failure, and learning to recognize success. If you live In the past, you will be suffocated by what has been. To be socially stable, you must have new, wonderful experiences, forging new memories to smile upon.

If you are not happy, if your heart and mind are nothing more than a sea of unstable emotions, you will accomplish nothing here. Papers will be brushed aside and exams will be forgotten about, replaced by late-night conferences with trusted friends and sessions of self-pity, locked away safely in a cramped dorm room.

But this kind of reflection only perpetuates grief and misery. The more you think about something, the more you let your troubles eat away at you, the more distraught you will become. Classes will be skipped to spend time alone with your thoughts. Attempts to bury your sadness in your work will ultimately prove futile. Your grades will sink in your sorrow.

Fortunately, there is always that person, that friend in whom you place your total confidence. They know what it is like to be you. They feel as you do, they've been there before. And they are so very easy to talk to; their warm empathy invites hours of intimate conversation.

Although they mean well, these generous hearts are pits of quicksand. Tread lightly around these kind souls, for they will not do you well. Speaking with these people, sharing your heartbreak with them, only dulls the senses. Yes, it does make things brighter for a bit. Hearts may breathe easier around their compassion. But it also creates an air of acceptance, that it is not only OK to live with social problems, but It is also acceptable to spend all day talking about them. In essence, they create a weak reality for you to conform to. These friends are a narcoleptic opiate...be cautious.

One's social life is the foundation from which everything else grows. Once you are settled, once your mind is at ease, then everything else comes naturally. You are genuinely happy. You can sit at your computer and write a paper without drowning in your own grief. You can study with a concentrated ease. Your work and your social life become two separate entities, and you deal with them accordingly. It is the only way to achieve success, for social instability acts as a sieve of sorts. It filters out your concentration and your passion and redirects them to combating your social ills.

Only when the two are separate can you work efficiently and truly be happy. Only then can you achieve your ambitions. Only then will the opportunities arrive.

See you next year, Amherst. I'll miss you.

The least we could do

Chris Bradshaw

The scene was the lobby of Bartlett Hall at 5:30 p.m. on a gray winter day. A young women sat reading at one of those new, mahogany-esque tables next to the vending machines to the right of the entrance. Another woman ran up the stairs that lead to the lecture hall. A guy chased her and tried to grab the back of her ankles. They reached the top breathless but smiling. "It's time for a smoke," they said.

Soon one of them cried out in six cracking, adolescent bursts of impatience for a light. He got no response.

Did a mystical savior draped in tobacco leaves emerge from between the soda and ice cream sandwiches and toss a Bic to the needy addicts? Well, no — he didn't come from between the vending machines and he was dressed a little more practically.

This smoker's savior moved quickly. He said nothing. He had been there the whole time. He listened. After he finished filling a large garbage bin with green plastic, he said one word to "Can I Get A Light" and hustled through the lobby down a hallway.

The two looked at each other. They laughed. The custodian returned. He waited.

"You smoke?" said the custodian. He was hesitating, maybe having doubts, maybe trying to solicit a little acknowledgment for his effort. In his hand was a crumpled package of Marlboro Lights. The pack looked old and new like only a pack of cigarettes can.

No answer was even grunted. The smokes and the yellow lighter that rested beside them were snatched from the custodians' hands. The two looked at each other again and turned to the door. Already outside, they tugged for control of the pack. A "thanks" leaked through two clenched, cigarette-filled mouths. The custodian had already turned and hunched back to work. His face was red, but he wasn't mad. He had the look that people get when they are embarrassed and alienated and have been made to feel low.

When asked if he could describe the interaction and his feelings about it, the custodian said: "They are kids. It's OK."

At the Blue Wall Cafe in the Campus Center, a young man works as a cashier. It is easy work, he says, and the pay isn't bad. "What gets me is how unbelievably rude people can be. You think kids would show me respect because they are my peers? No. I mean, I expect adults to be rude."

It is more upsetting that he is seen as Irrelevant and is disregarded by the people he sells slices of pizza to at the Blue Wall than that they make overtly rude comments. "Sometimes they just bark out what they want: 'Pepperoni and cheese!' or they're real quiet and indecisive and don't even look you in the face; 'Umm, I'll have a cheese... no a pepperoni... no make that a cheese," said the young man. He was angry. "Whatever. It doesn't matter," he said.

When asked if he often encounters phrases and words like "thank you" and "please," he lets out a mouth-wide-open, stomach-slapping laugh.

I doubt I am the only one who doesn't think that being a college student gives me the right to act like a snot-nosed ingrate.

I thought "college" was supposed to be a time for questioning one's ideas of what is truth and to observe all the different people out there from a more enlightened frame of mind than in high school. Apparently that would include abandoning the vocabulary for such novel phrases like "Thank you very much," and "I appreciate it."

True, we all have busy lives. But for someone who has spent years in the food service industry, get over it. There are probably at least a thousand people in this state who treat others notably better than you do, who can safely say their lives are "crazier" than yours.

Having told the story of the custodian and the two smokers to a number of my friends, most agreed — often with as much righteousness as a silk-suited TV evangelist — that the two culprits were in the wrong. Give credit to two bad-ass brothers who, throughout my pre-teen years, kept me in line via head locks, elbows, and rug burns. People walk alongside beautiful streams with their heads bowed to the pavement. They respond to "hellos" with nods and grunts and squinted eyelids. People bury themselves in smut magazines while angry voices yell out, form human blockades and wave placards across the street. And yes, gorgeous people across the nation snap their fingers at waitstaff. The latter segment of the population seems to forget who ultimately has control of the saliva level and overall cleanliness of their courses.

It is not possible to fully avoid living in our own heads for any sustained amount of time but certain situations call for us to meet the challenge. There is no excuse to ignore acts of kindness of the day-to-day breed.

When we fail to acknowledge the people who help us out or provide us with a service, when we can't manage to question our own questionable views or fail to climb out of our heads each day to listen to somebody else babble, we are the most pathetically human.

Chris Bradshaw is a UMass student.

Only three more Collegians left this semester.
You can cry now.

Wah!!!!!!..wah....ah, but wait– there is next semester, right?? and even if I am GRADUATING, I get to check out http://www.dailycollegian.com..Woo-hoo!

~Notes from the Campus Center Basement~

Emily Trask

This is the last and final "Notes" for the Spring 1999 semester. I am sure that everyone is in tears.

First and foremost, thanks for the pen.

It is spring — a time for love (or for hooking up with some random person at a party). Isn't it funny how people get the urge to get their groove on as soon as the temperature goes above 65 degrees?

Did you know that an Austrian doctor now believes that heart disease is not caused by an unhealthy lifestyle, but rather from the Chlamydia bacteria? Um...

I really want to be a lounge singer. I want to wear slinky red dresses and lie on a piano, while I sing blues and jazz tunes.

Who the hell is that coughing guy behind the wall?

I can't believe that they expect us, the students of this school, to pay an extra $75,000 to knock down that stupid fence. Isn't it interesting how beautiful new baseball fields and a new state-of-the-art Computer Science building can be built with our money, but UMass can't afford to knock down a puny little fence and put up a new one? Not to mention the fact that they cut $2,000,000 from the periodicals budget! I bet they didn't cut the periodicals from the computer science and engineering departments.

Speaking of the library, whoever designed that must have had some deep feelings of inadequacy. The people who chose that particular design also had some issues that need to be worked through.

I also have something to say to the Theatre Guild: If you want publicity, you have to accept the criticism and the praise that goes along with it. This is just the way of the world.

I would like to give a loud shout-out to Mike, Paradise rules, baby.

Is that the school president to the right of us? Why yes it is. He's kind of short, isn't he?

* * *

I love the grad lounge when I'm with Tanya.

First Annual MCA awards

Stardate: end of the school year. And what a year It has been. Violence, war, shootings and that's just the SGA. With so much that has happened since September, it Is up to the Collegian's own Multicultural Affairs page to put this past year in perspective and recognize the best and worst with the MCA (get it? MultiCultural Affairs) awards:

The Craig Mack Award for ugliest rapper:

Busta Rhymes. My man is so ugly he makes Freddy Krueger say "Damn!"

The Greeks Aren't All Bad Award for most positive fraternity/sorority:

Gamma Phi Sigma. UMass' first Latino fraternity works hard for the community and has been fighting for affirmative action. They do it all because they want to, not for good press.

The Golf Award for most boring sport to watch:

With no MJ, what exactly is the point of the NBA?

The Pee Your Pants Award for funniest TV show:

Univision's "Lente Loco." It is one of the funniest shows on television and I have no idea what they are saying.

The Bulger TV Award for most minority-unfriendly television network:

NBC, for not having any minority-based programming on prime-time. The best they have is Kevin Eubanks and his nightly kissing of Jay Leno's ass on "The Tonight Show." At least Fox has two, "The P.J.'s" and "Cops."

The MaSe Award for worst rapper:

Well, okay, it's MaSe. He is so wack that he makes Vanilla Ice sound like Rakim. Honorable mention: Cam'ron.

The Thank God Brandy Was In It Or I Would Have Had To Get My Money Back Award for worst movie:

I Still Know What You Did Last Summer. This movie was really great... when It was Scream. Every bad movie should have Brandy in it so that you have a reason to watch. That still would not have helped Eddie Murphy's Holy Man.

The Corona Award for best import of the year:

Children Of Heaven. This was an Oscar nominee for best foreign motion picture. This Iranian movie is the best children's movie in awhile. If you can find it, rent it!

The Use Only For Toilet Paper Award for worst magazine:

The Source. This magazine has stopped being a hip–hop magazine since Puff graced the cover a minute back. Since then every No Limit and Bad Boy act has been on the cover at least once and underground acts have been getting less Ink. Start buying hip–hop magazines with actual hip–hop in them.

The Minority Xena Award for best female action hero:

Mulan. She beats up just as many guys as everyone's favorite lesbian icon, but with a multicultural twist. Honorable mention: Jennifer Lopez for empowering women by making a big booty a mark of distinction for Butta Pecan Ricans, sisters and anyone else with a lot of junk In their trunk.

The Divide And Conquer Award:

UMass president Billy Bulger and the boys for trying to pit minorities and the poor against each other in the admissions debate.

The Unite And Lead To Victory Award:

Louis Farrakhan. Misrepresented in the media and feared by whites, he is the only true black leader.

The Turn It Up Award for best radio station:

91.1 WMUA–FM. They keep It real with music for everyone.

— see ya next semester —

Connections

I'm sorry but the love that you are trying to reach has been disconnected.
The value of life relationships has been constantly disrespected
We have neglected to see that we are all victims
Of the evil thoughts that roam the planes as our minds sit numb
Some become stressed, while the rest try to test
Neither asking the questions that unite them to the quest
What are WE going to do?
Cause these social problems can't end with only me or you
We must combine our efforts to the task and combat evil's finest tool:
separation
Rearrange our connections for clearly educated communication
You cannot abominate all hate, yet we can use each other as means to educate
And to educate simply means to give Instruction
Exposing your mentality and morality to reconstruction
You can also educate by doing nothing
Giving the impression that there's nothing to be done
Since we are all treated equally, living under the sun?
So why should I feel any shame, or be the one to blame
When one of my good friends is (please fill in your token name)
But what is your primary aim, to make new friends or to make the world a safe place
Free of discrimination on the basis of gender, religion, orientation, race...
Take a look at your face and find your active place in the puzzle
Stop wearing the visual muzzle that teles your vision
What to expect from a collision of diverse decisions
search for truth, people are walking books to read
But that will only ruffice half the deed
Unless you apply your actions to your daily life routine
Then maybe a change will occur throughout the bigger scene

The UMass world

One of my expectations for studying abroad here in the U.S. was that this would be a time for experiencing and learning different cultures, and meeting people of different races and nationalities. Compared to the college life at home in Japan, I think one of the most attractive things about American campus life is more opportunity to associate and study with people who are from different cultural or educational backgrounds. At the same time, that made me realize how a racial factor plays a significant role in American society and how it exists as an unnoticeable issue, consciously or unconsciously, in people's minds. Since I lived my entire 21 years in Japan with little knowledge about the perpetual racial struggles going on in American society, it is not surprising that I experienced some cultural shocks during my eight months in the "small" world of UMass.

First of all, it was very interesting for me to learn there are a lot of student associations which are organized according to race, nationality and minority student political actlvities. Asian, African–American, Caucasian, Latino, etc., each of them unite to encourage each other to fight for their rights, to respect their racial pride and to share their original culture with people who are unfamiliar with them by events. Since America is said to be a melting pot and there are many different races and nationalities, people are even more aware of individual identity and cultural differences.

Before I came here, I thought a melting pot meant that everyone wanted to blend into a generic "American citizen." Now I realize that as much as people want this melting pot, they also want to keep their separate identity. People are very proud of their culture. Because I was living within the majority in Japanese society where racial minorities constitute a very minute number, I did not have to compare myself with different racial groups, and had not thought about my racial identity or rights for my own culture seriously.

Keika Horiuchi

While I have been here, I have had the chance to go to two different cultural nights. One was organized by Casa–Dominicana, an RSO for Dominican students, and the other by the Asian–American Student Association. Each of them was not only very interesting as an event and attracted me to those different cultures, but they also had a big impact on recognizing my own Japanese Identity. When I went to the Dominican Republic event, I was amazed at the lively Latin dance and music, and how the people there were proud of their culture of origin. When I went to Asian Night, I felt familiarity as an Asian on the one hand, but on the other hand, I felt the difference of character between people who were brought up in the U.S. as compared to those who were brought up in Japan, Taiwan, China, and so on. Even though we have the similar or the same racial backgrounds, I feel we have different cultural backgrounds.

Also, I thought it is interesting that the Collegian, one of the major news suppliers for students on campus, plays an active and important role for keeping students awake to political and racial matters debated on the campus. Though featuring racial issues regularly or reporting a series of changes about the admissions policy at the University, I think the paper reflects the frank opinions of students with various perspectives for controversial issues and faces up to the complexity of reality. At least there is a place on this campus that students can express their thoughts, anger, or complaints and try to make a situation better.

"The campus as a whole has little interest in having a relationship outside of one's own racial clique."

Even though each organization has strong unity under common background and thought, the campus as a whole has little interest in developing a relationship outside of one's own racial clique. Even the population of residential areas on the campus is obviously broken up by race. Of course if we look on an individual level, a lot of students have friends and other relationships regardless of their race or nationality. But soon after I came here, I was shocked by the reality of this separated campus, which may be all too common to see, and even care about, for those who have been brought up in this country.

Generally, for students on campus it is natural to associate with people of the same race or nationality; they seem to not want to go out of their way to interact with people from different racial backgrounds. Rather they stay with people they have always been with. It takes an effort to reach outside of the familiar group with which you share a common culture and abilities to understand each other easily. On the other hand, I am an exchange student who has a nine–month limit for remaining here. I am very curious about getting to know anybody with a different race or nationality. So, In a sense, It is no wonder I have a different attitude. Of course, I understand why it feels more comfortable staying with people who share the common culture and language, the way they enjoy themselves is the same. There is no worry about the difference of color or being categorized.

Now I realize the problems are not as simple for different racial groups to interact as much as I expect, and the historical antagonisms seem to remain a serious factor. I have come to the conclusion — even though it might not be the best solution — to just leave the situation as It is. We cannot force change overnight, all we can need to do is respect the differences of each group. What is important, regardless of the race or nationality, is for people to express themselves freely, to enjoy spending time with one another. It does not matter whether the campus is racially divided, opportunities to interact and make friends with people of different cultures depends on the way you think.

Through studying at UMass for the past eight months I have been able to look at myself outside of Japan. There are many findings. I have learned it is very interesting, difficult and important to interact with people from different cultural backgrounds. It has been fascinating to recognize how I have inherited that Japanese nature. When I think back about my stay here, I may have limited myself from Interacting with many people because I have little confidence in my English and because I am a shy person. The fact that I myself have stayed with my own kind has made me feel very disappointed with myself.

At the same time, the basis of my ideal that people are willing and able to have more interracial relationships has become pretty shaky. I have come to think that I am too naive and too Idealistic to believe that. But my experiences of sharing time with others has broadened my understanding of the different and similar points of views and values we have. Also, studying in class and reading the Collegian has helped me to understand part of the racial realities in American society that I did not know very much about.

However, the racial problems in the U.S. are so complicated and have to be considered from various points of view to understand them. The questions of racial matters are so heavy and so tough to deal with. Every country has its own complicated history. The U.S. is so young that it has only been 30 years or so since all of its citizens obtained basic civil rights. Even though it took many generations to work through, I think the public's awareness toward the racial division will gradually change. In conclusion, being an exchange student in the U.S. has influenced my perspective and I bet thir will help me look at my own country differently when I return.

Police action defended in Miller death

By Anthony Breznican
Associated Press

RIVERSIDE, Calif. — Four police officers were justified when they fired 23 bullets at a young black woman they found sitting armed and unresponsive in a disabled car, the district attorney said yesterday.

District Attorney Grover Trask said the officers may have acted hastily and made mistakes in judgment, but they did not act criminally when they killed Tyisha Miller, 19, in December.

Ms. Miller's death led to allegations that the officers — three whites and a Hispanic — were racists. Religious leaders, civil rights activists and residents of Riverside, 60 miles east of Los Angeles, protested the shooting at town hall meetings, vigils and marches.

"We thought we were going to get justice but we just got the same old thing," said the Rev. Bernell Butler, Ms. Miller's cousin. "Police officers are able to murder and get away with it."

State Attorney General Bill Lockyer endorsed Trask's decision, saying the police actions were "unwise and ill-conceived" but not sufficient for criminal charges. He said he would investigate reports of "racial insensitivity" within the Riverside Police Department.

Ms. Miller had pulled into a gas station parking lot with a flat tire. Relatives who arrived to help her said they called police after Ms. Miller appeared to be having a seizure and was foaming at the mouth.

Trask said the officers found Ms. Miller unresponsive, lying on the fully reclined driver's seat with a gun in her lap. They were unable to awaken her by banging on the windows, shining lights or shaking the car, he said.

When an officer tried to break the driver's side window with a baton and reach for the gun, Ms. Miller sat up, lifted a pager and stared at the cop, who backed away, Trask said.

One officer yelled at the others to hold their fire, and the woman lay down again, Trask said. When she rose up again and appeared to reach for the gun, the officers all fired, the prosecutor said.

A coroner's report Indicated all the bullets entered her body from the back, proving that she was not laying down when she was shot, Trask said. Her loaded gun was never fired. Ms. Miller was hit by 12 of the 23 bullets. Four struck her In the head.

Toxicology tests showed Ms. Miller had a blood-alcohol level of .13 percent. A driver in California is legally intoxicated at .08 percent. Tests also detected marijuana residue.

Trask said the officers' plan to break in the window of Ms. Miller's locked car to get the gun out of her lap may have been a mistake, but it did not reach the level of criminal conduct.

"In deciding whether or not to file criminal charges, the job was not to determine what the police could have done or even what they should have done," Trask said.

University gallery re–opens

COURTESY UNIVERSITY GALLERY

Michael Tong's piece, Mt. Hibachi, is the model of a mountain placed on top of a hibachi. It will be on display through June 5.

By Yemisi Makuolu
Collegian Correspondent

The University Gallery at the University of Massachusetts, Amherst is hidden in a crevice of the Fine Arts Center. It was sealed from the public and lost in our memories for a year. In celebration of the re–opening of the gallery, they will present an exhibition entitled "Alumni IV."

Jennifer Lind of the gallery says, "The gallery was re– opened on April 10. It was closed in April 1998 due to the extensive construction of the Fine Arts Center walkway."

Lind said that eleven UMass alumni were chosen from a group of 105 applicants. This large–scale competition is the fourth exhibition of its kind which usually occurs every five years.

The 11 artists are Roberly Bell, Gordon Chandler, Kathleen Gilrain, Richard Gubernick, Ron–Wontae Kim, Lisa Lesnik, Kathleen Scheider, Robert Smit, Al Souza and Michael Tong.

This exhibition is broad, exciting and colorful. It explores the physical and theoretical possibilities of printing, sculpture, installation and painting in the late '90s.

The works are strongly post–modern. These 11 artists illustrate the use of appropriation and juxtaposition in postmodern work. In relation to this exhibition, postmodernism can be simply defined as incorporating and allowing anything to exist in the same space.

Tong appropriates familiar Japanese images and juxtaposes them with modern concepts. One of his exhibition works is called Mt. Hibachi, 1998. It is a model of a mountain placed on top of a hibachi. The simple play of image and title makes this work humorous.

Bell plays on our understanding of 1950's sexism. In Disputed Territories, 1996, Bell morphs organic surrealist shapes with household utensils. She encloses them in a simple house structure made from wire fencing.

Bell says in the artist statement that she was concerned with "space and sexuality." Bell explains that "kitchen utensils refer... to the [female's], physical, emotional and political relationship [in society]." These "female markers" hang strangely, suspended within the "cage–house." Issues of constraint are distinct in this installation.

Scheider sensuously illustrated a poem from the Old Testament "Song of Songs." Scheider states in a letter that she was not drawn by religion. She says her interests lie in the images of romance, erotic and sacred love.

Untitled (red piece), 1998–99 is a rich red hanging sculpture comprised of tactile, velvety pieces. Scheider juxtaposes biblical imagery of grapes, sheep and other farm animals. You immediately see its reference to early Christianity. She creates an eye–catching, sumptuous, luxuriant image. The vibrant red and the

Gumert talks about composing

By Melissa Clinton
Collegian Correspondent

Local musician and composer Lynn Gumert visited the University of Massachusetts Fine Arts Center Tuesday to give a lecture about her work and what it is like to be a female composer.

Gumert received her bachelors degree in composition from Catholic University in Washington, D.C. and her masters and doctorate degrees at Indiana University, Bloomington. She has written a number of works including six commissions. Five of her compositions have won awards and one has been broadcast on a nationally syndicated radio station.

Gumert is presently participating in local choruses as a vocalist and writing for these ensembles. She is also working on two commissions for church choir, and has written music for several instruments and for solo voice, vocal duets, chorus and orchestra.

In an interview, she said her compositional style is broad and unrestricted because "We have the knowledge of all the periods and styles of music." Influences on her music are the works of Ruth Crawford Seeger and Latin American music. She said her music is influenced by feminism, and she believes that "music should communicate something."

Her writing focuses on vocal music where she uses lyrics to communicate to the listeners. Most of her verses are written by other women and contain material that has special meaning to her as a woman. Some of these themes include finding voices, injustices, child abuse and equal education. Her lyrics do not have to be in any specific form and can come from any written material.

As a female composer she said it was difficult to receive mentoring. During the lecture she stated that classes she had taken "[did] not include female composers, in fact they tend to neglect them." She mentioned that in a history class only one female composer was included. However, she said "There is less anxiety about being original [as a female composer] because I am so different from Mozart and Beethoven that they are not as threatening."

Old film, new music

By Emily Trask
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts International Festival for the Arts (MIFA) will present the Buster Keaton silent film The Navigator, along with the music premiere of award–winning composer Peter Blanchette's original movie score this weekend in Shelburne Falls.

This is the second Buster Keaton silent film and music premiere in Shelburne Falls that showcases the talents of its hometown composer, Peter Blanchette. Last year's smash hit performance of Keaton's The General inspired this year's presentation of The Navigator.

Blanchette's music "re–animates" the visual comic genius of Buster Keaton. His band Includes Alki Sterlopulous (piano, accordion), Peter Blanchette (archguitar, bass guitar, slide guitar, sampler), and Jean Chaine (percussion, bass guitars).

Peter Blanchette explains his new work: "I had been looking for a way in which to make listenable music from the 'junk shop' of my musical imagination. Symphony music and chamber music seemed contrived when such disparate elements were mixed. Then I realized cartoon composers had been doing this for decades. It's possible then to call this 'neo–cartoonist silent film music' — and a chance to work with Buster Keaton."

In this film, Keaton finally got to play his adored Saphead character— a pampered, useless playboy surrounded by maids, butlers and chauffeurs, a man who can't shave himself and has yet to light his own cigarette.

On Columbus Day 1924, the Navigator premiered at New York's Capitol, the biggest movie theater in the world. It was held over a second week, which was rare for the Capitol. The film received almost unanimous praise. It became Keaton's largest financial success.

The film cost only $350,000 and its domestic gross was only $680,406.

This 75th anniversary presentation of The Navigator will be shown on 72–year–old carbon arc projectors in the 101– year–old Memorial Hall Theater, which is one of the many architectural gems of the Shelburne Falls area.

objects may also refer to passion and revelry.

All these works explore aspects in contemporary art and society. Souza deals with cartoon imagery and Kim deals with memory.

Lind says that "the University Gallery houses about 2,500 UMass–owned works; these works are predominantly works on paper, photographs, prints, drawings and paintings."

The list contains works by famous artists, like Jasper Johns, Robert Raushenberg, Roy Lichtenstein, Susan Rothenberg and Robert Morris. According to Lind, "during the renovations about 1,500 of these works were moved to a smaller gallery."

The new renovations will allow direct access into the gallery via the walkway. Construction hardly disturbed the structure of the gallery. Lind explained that "only a minimal amount of gallery space was lost through construction."

Each work engages with new aesthetics in art. Therefore it might not be everyone's cup of tea, but it will stimulate and introduce people to issues in contemporary art.

This exhibition is on through June 5. Gallery hours are Tuesday–Friday, 11 a.m.–4:30 p.m. and Saturday–Sunday, 2– 5 p.m.

Student composers present their pieces

By Melissa Clinton
Collegian Correspondent

Three female student composers, Serena Vashti Armstrong, Maia Nisi and Jaime Jones, had pieces performed at the Student Composers' Concert this Tuesday.

Armstrong's piece for solo Contrabass, titled Miles Brown of Ithaca,N.Y., was the first of the three composers to be performed. It was performed by Jan Ahourak.

Armstrong is a student of Salvatore Macchia and is an exchange student from the University of Wollongong, near Sydney, Australia. She has also studied with Houston Dunleavy and Stephen Ingham.

Her piece was written for, and named after, a friend who is a doublebass major at Eastman School of Music in Rochester. She will finish her undergraduate degree in Creative Arts (music composition) this year.

Jones' piece was titled Variation for Siring Quartet, and is one movement of a larger piece she has been working on. It was played by Editha Bla_kovâ (violin), Christine Lee (violin), David Kovâ_ (viola) and Roman Pla_ek (cello).

Jones is also a student of Macchia. She is a second–year graduate student who received her bachelor degree from Sarah Lawrence College in 1997. She has also studied with George Tsontakis and Dean Dammond.

Nisi had a piece for solo piano performed at the concert. She originally received a degree in Science Education and is now concentrating on composing.

Nisi is a student of Dr. Robert Stern, and has taken lessons with Pulitzer Prize winner Karel Husa and Robert M. Palmer. She is currently working on a piece for organ and four–part chorus.

Armstrong, Jones and Nisi were three of nine composers featured at this concert. All three pieces were well–received by the audience.

Thanks- goodnight!

recognize a need for more scoring to offset the high- octane offenses they'll encounter at Nationals.

"If you can't score four goals, you'll lose 99 percent of the time," Junior field player Laurie Edwards said. UMass averaged less than four goals per game during its four California losses in March.

"We've improved defensively all season, but we can still play a better game offensively," McOsker said. "We'll need to in order to beat a team like Davis."

Ironically, the Maroon and White's most dangerous offensive weapon doesn't see it that way.

"The offense will happen," said All-American Katie Grogan, who leads UMass with 69 goals and was named MVP of the Eastern tournament. "Defense is the key to the whole weekend."

The fact of the matter is that the Minutewomen will need to step up their plan on both sides of the ball to make waves at Nationals. Not only will UMass have to contend with the top Western schools; they may also face Maryland and Princeton, the only Eastern teams to best the Maroon and White in '99.

But for now, the Minutewomen will keep their sights zeroed in on the Mustangs.

"There's only one thing on our minds right now: beating Davis," said freshman 2-meter Jacqui Goodhue. "We need to take it one game at a time, and focus on coming out strong."

through the competition and eventually played its way into the College World Series.

"We had a great dry run at that a year ago," Sortino said. "I can't think of anything more difficult than to be the No. 1 team in the region, win your [conference] championship, and then have to go to the No. 2 team in the region and play into the national tournament. I just thought that was one of the dumbest things I have ever seen in my life. We were down there with six parents and 700 people from Hofstra. Good grief, talk about a lopsided stage."

The only Minutewoman defeat in the A-10 came at the hands of host St. Joseph's on April 4. UMass has won 12 consecutive conference games since the loss.

BRIAN MCDERMOTT / COLLEGIAN

Freshman Cherra Wheeler will be expected to provide a powerful punch for the Minutewomen offense this weekend.

■ baseball

The Saints tallied 13 hits of their own as four players had two hits apiece. Both teams committed four errors.

This weekend the Minutemen will host St. Bonaventure (21-19, 7-8 A-10) for a three-game series at Earl Lorden Field. UMass has one more scheduled home game after this weekend against Maine next Thursday.

The Bonnies are enjoying an eight game winning streak which began with a 4-3 win over Temple on April 25. During the stretch they beat A-10 rival St. Joseph's three times and recently slapped Cleveland St. with a 24-11 loss.

Jason Milleisen has put up impressive numbers at the plate, batting .352 with seven doubles, eight home runs while driving in 36 runs. Doug Evans is right behind Milleisen with nine dingers and 32 RBIs.

The ace of the pitching staff, Mike Gray, has made 16 appearances with an 8-2 record and five saves for the Bonnies. Vance Cozier, who earned his fourth win against Cleveland St. on Wednesday, has struck out 71 batters while his batters are averaging .254 against him.

Last year UMass beat the Bonnies twice in three attempts as Bill Cooke earned his eighth win of the season. Cooke looks to break the school's record for most career wins this weekend. The senior is currently tied with Jason Bennett (1994-97) at 25.

Further tests, which could take weeks, are being done.

Cannella took time during the press conference to remember Sopracasa, the starting pole midfielder for UMass and a player Cannella described at the season's start as someone who "wouldn't back down from anything."

"I'd just like to say that he was a great kid, a great teammate for our guys, a great supporter. Everybody loved Soup," he said, referring to his player by his commonly used nickname. "The people who knew him here on campus, which is quite a few, really thought a lot of him and will continue to do so, including myself."

The Minutemen, who fell to No. 6 Syracuse, 8-6, last Friday in the final home game of the season, finishes the year at 4-8. Brown closes out its season with a 4-9 mark.

BRIAN MCDERMOTT / COLLEGIAN

Can't hardly wait 'til fall!

Women's polo in tourney

Eastern champs to face UC–Davis in first round

By Adam White
Collegian Staff

Forget the preseason hype. Forget the 8–0 start. Forget the blowout victories, the winning streaks and the shattered records.

When a shrill whistle blast opens play at this weekend's Collegiate Water Polo National Championships in Davis, Calif., the entire '99 regular season will be reduced to a mere afterthought. What will remain are 16 teams hell–bent on wiping each other out and bringing home the ultimate glory of a national title.

And for the women of No. 10 Massachusetts, it'll be business as usual.

"With the exception of the top four teams, the rest of the field is pretty much level," said Coach Dan McOsker, whose Minutewomen captured an eighth place finish at last year's nationals. "Whoever shows up and executes the best will come out on top."

UMass (29–6) will face No. 7 UC–Davis (24–10) in Friday's opening action. The host Mustangs have weathered a tough schedule in '99, dropping a number of close games to higher ranked schools (the most notable being a 4–1 loss to No. 2 Stanford in February). Their high point this season consisted of an emotional 7–4 upset of No. 5 Hawaii on February 16.

The Minutewomen, meanwhile, have spent this season punishing their East Coast counterparts en route to their second consecutive Eastern Championship. In games against Eastern competition this year, UMass posted an astonishing 27–2 mark while torching their opposition by an average score of 11–5.

Those gaudy numbers won't mean much at Nationals, however: Of the nine teams seeded ahead of UMass, eight hail from the Golden State (Hawaii is the ninth).

UMass suffered through a dismal 2–4 West Coast swing during spring break in March, including sobering defeats at the hands of No. 4 UCLA (6–2), No. 6 San Diego State (10–5), and No. 8 UC–Santa Barbara (6–4). Those teams, along with No. 1 USC, No. 2 Stanford, and No. 3 California make up the meat of the Nationals field.

One reason for the East–West disparity, according to UMass goalie Dana Sinkwich, is the recruiting power wielded by California's top programs. "Water polo is really big in Europe," Sinkwich said. "The better west coast schools are able to attract the top foreign players." The top– seeded Trojans are, according to Sinkwich, "almost all Yugoslavians."

Teammate Marci Hupp, meanwhile, views the March trip as a barometer of the Maroon and White's progress toward a championship level of play. "We actually have more confidence after the spring break trip," said Hupp, whose performance at this year's Eastern Championships earned her first team All–East honors. "Even though we lost to some great teams, we were able to play at their level."

Although McOsker has spent much of this season singing the praises of team defense, he has focused during the last few weeks on fine–tuning his offense. Players and coach both

UMass softball competes for A-10 title this weekend

By Aaron Saykin

Pressure, building until the brink of a burst.

The question is, can it be withstood? The answer is, it has to be.

It's almost as if the Massachusetts softball team must win the Atlantic 10 Tournament Championship this weekend in Salem, Va. The players have done it for the past four seasons, and there seems to be an atmosphere of high expectation surrounding them.

The A–10 post–season victor is assured a spot in the NCAA tournament. During the past two seasons, the Minutewomen have made the most of their automatic bid, as they qualified for the College World Series. And now that they've begun to achieve excellence with regularity, they will be expected to sustain it. Fair or unfair, the current UMass team has inherited a wealth of distinction and responsibility. By stealing the regular–season conference title from Virginia Tech last weekend with a pair of wins, the No. 1–seeded Minutewomen will be favored to win the tournament, even if it is being played in the Hokies' back yard.

But the pressure does not bother UMass coach Elaine Sortino, who has watched her predominantly underclassmen team hurdle all the potential obstacles of inexperience it has faced this season.

"We've been under the gun all year long. This team has handled the pressure," said Sortino, who also pointed out that the Virginia Tech fans may come out in full force over the weekend. "The screaming and yelling doesn't matter. They're focused."

The Minutewomen will play their first contest of the double–elimination tournament today at noon, when they will meet Dayton. The Flyers are the only team in the conference which UMass has not played. Its double–header scheduled for April 17 was postponed because of rain, and never made up. The winner of that contest will play the victor of the St. Joseph's–Virginia Tech meeting tomorrow in the winner's bracket of the tournament. All four teams will continue to compete until they lose two contests. One team will remain, and Sortino will do everything she can to ensure that the team is UMass.

As indicated last Sunday, Sortino will pitch her ace Danielle Henderson in every contest during the weekend. Henderson boasts a mark of 25–2, and is yet to be defeated in conference play.

Sortino admits that she would usually be worried about competing in a high–stakes tournament so close to Virginia Tech, which is the No. 2 team in the entire Northeast region behind UMass; however, she feels extremely comfortable in light of the circumstances from last season. In 1998, the No. 1 Minutewomen traveled to No. 2 Hofstra to compete in a play–in game, whose winner would advance to the NCAA Tournament. A poised UMass squad fought

Pacers & Spurs should play for NBA season title

The 1999 NBA season may have been tough to swallow from an observer's perspective in any capacity but as Walt "Clyde" Frazier likes to proclaim this time of year, "It's Playoff Time Man!" Since the season was severely shortened, this year's champion will carry an asterisk for several years to come. Nonetheless there are several legitimate contenders for the crown, so let's break it down.

Eastern Conference: (Seeds in parenthesis)

1. Miami Heat vs. 8. New York Knicks

For the second consecutive season, these bitter enemies will hook up in the first round, with this year's series billed as "BattleBrawl '99." These teams feature Georgetown centers heading in opposite directions, with Miami's Alonzo Mourning reaching the peak of his career, and NY's Patrick Ewing past the twilight. The series will certainly be a hard– fought affair, with Jeff Van Gundy's job on the line.

Key match–up: Jamal Mashburn vs. Larry Johnson

Prediction: Heat in 5

2. Indiana Pacers vs. 7. Milwaukee Bucks

Give George Karl credit for bringing the Bucks to the playoffs in his first year at the helm, but the celebration will be short–lived. With Sam Cassell and Glenn Robinson hampered with nagging injuries, the Pacers have the edge at every position. The experience factor cements their advantage and could lead to a clean sweep.

Key match–up: Ray Allen vs. Reggie Miller

Prediction: Pacers in 3

3. Orlando Magic vs. 6. Philadelphia 76ers

Mastermind match–up along the sidelines between Larry Brown and Chuck Daly will cast a large shadow over the hardwood itself. Magic will need Darrell Armstrong to continue providing a spark and Ike Austin to step up in the middle. Sixers appear up to the challenge but will fall just short of an upset.

Key match–up: Allen Iverson vs. Penny Hardaway

Prediction: Magic in 5

4. Atlanta Hawks vs. 5. Detroit Pistons

The most even pairing in the eastern half of the first round will boil down to the play of go–to guys Steve Smith and Grant Hill. Hawks will need Dikembe Mutombo to supply some offense, and Christian Laettner will be seeking revenge against his old mates, particularly Alan Henderson who claimed his job at small forward in Hotlanta.

Key Match–up : Smith vs Hill

Prediction: Hawks in 4

2nd Round: Hawks over Heat in 7, Pacers over Magic in 5, Eastern Finals: Pacers over Hawks in 6

Western Conference:

1. San Antonio Spurs vs. 8. Minnesota T–Wolves

For the first time since Dennis Rodman roamed the Alamodome, the Spurs are head honchos in the West, thanks to an unbelievable stretch run. It will take at least a Western Finals appearance to assure naysayers that the Spurs are for real. Minnesota certainly won't prove otherwise.

Key match–up: Tim Duncan vs. Kevin Garnett

Prediction: Spurs in 4

2. Portland Trailblazers vs 7. Phoenix Suns

If the suddenly downtrodden Blazers had run into Sacramento, they would have been headed for a first–round exit, but instead they drew the inferior Suns. Phoenix will likely scratch one out in America West before fading into the sunset.

Key match–up: Damon Stoudamire vs. Jason Kidd

Prediction: Blazers in 4

3. Utah Jazz vs 6. Sacramento Kings

On paper this series looks like a wipe–out, but the Kings have played playoff–caliber ball all season, on their way to their second post–season bid in the '90s. A pumped–up Chris Webber will give Karl Malone all he can handle, and crafty Jason Williams could run circles around an aging John Stockton.

Key match–up: Webber vs. Malone

Prediction: Jazz in 5

4. Los Angeles Lakers vs. 5. Houston Rockets

Shaquille O'Neal dominated Hakeem Olajuwon in the regular season, outscoring "The Dream" by over seven points. The Lakers swiped two of three games in the series, and appear to be the clear–cut favorite with home–court in tow, but I'm sticking with intuition and veteran leadership in selecting Houston. If any team can win game five on the road the battle–tested Rockets are it, but Scottie Pippen must return to championship form.

Key match–up : Pippen or Charles Barkley vs. Glen Rice

Prediction: Rockets in 5

2nd Round: Spurs over Rockets in 6, Jazz over Blazers in 5, West Finals : Spurs over Jazz in 7

NBA Finals: Spurs over Pacers in 6 in an all ABA final.

UMass hosts Bonnies after defeat at Siena

By Kathleen Ralls
Collegian Staff

Unable to stop the slide, the Massachusetts baseball team (22–18, 10–5 Atlantic 10) dropped its sixth game in a row, this time to Siena College (29–20, 21–5 Metro Atlantic) in a 8–6 decision yesterday in Loudenville, N.Y. The two teams were scheduled to meet on Tuesday but the game was cancelled because of rain.

UMass' Brian Hourigan pitched the first four innings, allowing two earned runs while striking out two Saints. Todd Samolewicz, Nick Skirkanich and Bill Cooke all took turns on the mound before the day was through. Skirkanich (1–3) was eventually strapped with the loss.

Siena also offered four hurlers before Jeremy Giard nailed down the win to improve to 1–1 on the year. Giard only pitched the eighth inning, facing four batters while compiling one K.

UMass got on board in the top of the first when Aaron Braunstein connected with an RBI groundout. Nick Gorneault doubled the lead in the third when he drove in the Minutemen's second run.

Siena quickly erased that lead in the fourth when Steve Castellani belted a two–run single. Braunstein, who totaled three RBIs, came through in the fifth when the senior lifted a two–run home run, his 11th of the year, to retake the lead, 4–2.

A battle of the titans was brewing as Castellani, who went 2–for–2 with a total of four RBIs, punished UMass with another two–run single, tying the game up at 4–4 in the bottom of the sixth.

Scoreless in the sixth inning, UMass freshman Chris Morgan and Kevin O'Connell stepped it up with an RBI single each. But the cat–and–mouse chase would not end as the Saints answered in the bottom of the seventh with two runs of its own. Siena's Kevin Murray singled in a run and Trey Gethoefer ripped an RBI double.

In the eighth, UMass couldn't produce another run as Siena repeated its pattern with another pair of runs to hold on for the win.

Braunstein, O'Connell and Aaron Senez, all had two hits for the Minutemen, who scattered 11 on the day. Seniors Bryan Mazzaferro, Brian Samela also contributed to the offense with one hit apiece.

UM–Brown lax game cancelled due to death

By Casey Kane
Collegian Staff

Saturday's game between the Massachusetts and Brown men's lacrosse teams was cancelled yesterday evening after a meeting between the Minuteman players and coaches.

In the wake of the death of UMass player Eric Sopracasa, the team met and decided not to play the game, which was to be the last of the season for both teams.

The game was scheduled for a 1 p.m. start in Providence, R.I.

In a brief press conference yesterday afternoon in the William D. Mullins Center, Massachusetts coach Greg Cannella made a short statement expressing his grief.

"I would first like to express my grief and sorrow for the entire Sopracasa family and the friends of Eric's," Cannella said. "Certainly my thoughts and everyone on our team's prayers are with Eric. Eric will be missed greatly."

Sopracasa was injured around 4 p.m. during a practice on the Lower Boyden Fields. He collapsed and stopped breathing, and was taken to Cooley Dickinson Hospital after being revived briefly. He was later pronounced dead.

"At this time what we know is that Eric took a shot to the chest yesterday," Cannella said. "It's really unclear what caused his death. Until we get the medical examiner's reports I cannot speculate on his cause of death."

A press release issued from the UMass News Office yesterday evening stated that "preliminary reports from the medical examiner indicate death appears to have occurred due to accidental blunt force to the chest."

After a two year drought spring concert wasn't all wet

By Danielle Fugazy
Collegian Staff

The approximately 8,000 people attending Spring Concert Saturday were reportedly "excited" as the eight different groups performed. By the day of the show, the concert in the William D. Mullins Center was sold out to the general public.

"Fans seemed to be content with the performance and the crowd got really excited," said University Productions and Concerts (UPC)'s Production Manager Damon Eden.

The Student Government Association (SGA) and the UPC staff who organized the Spring Concert were pleased with the day as a whole, which included their decision to hold the Spring Concert indoors rather then on the lawn next to the Student Union.

"Overall it was a great day and night," said Andrew Mushlin, UPC's talent coordinator. "Having it inside worked well considering the fact that it rained. If it was outside it probably would have been cancelled."

"We had a great turnout, we were really happy about that," said SGA Speaker Lisa Cook. "We hope this sets a precedent for Spring Concerts to come."

Avi Khanna, a former member of SGA who worked on planning the Spring Concert echoed Cook's words.

"It was a huge success," Khanna said. "A lot of people had a good time. It made up for not having concerts in the past."

Eden had a slightly different take on Saturday's event.

"I was surprised and disappointed there weren't more people of color there," Eden said. "There was diversity in the line–up and it was 98 percent white during KRS–One and they were having a good time."

Two stages were set up at either end of the Mullins Center and the bands alternated stages. Between sets, t–shirts were thrown in to the crowd along with gift certificates for jeans and bookbags and passes to a fitness center.

Overall, students thought the show was good, although there were mixed reviews as to whether having it inside was better then having it outside.

"It was good we got in for free, but it should have been outside, even with the rain," said Mike Sterrett, a junior management major.

Matt Weinshank, a senior finance major, said that "having it inside worked out well because of the rain. This show was better then the show two years ago."

"The concert was okay," said Liz McNeil, a junior sports management major. "It would have been a lot more fun outside, but this was much better then the one two years ago. This year had better groups. Cypress Hill was good and the concert was fun."

Cook and Eden said that the Mullins Center venue worked well with the weather.

"Yesterday was a perfect example of why the concert was held in the Mullins Center," Cook said.

"The rain would have put a damper on the Spring Concert. I am just happy that everyone looked like they were having a good time."

"I thought it was a good show and that we lucked out that it rained," Eden said. "I was against having it in the Mullins Center but I guess it was a good call."

NATO launches new attacks

By George Jahn
Associated Press

BELGRADE, Yugoslavia — Undeterred by criticism, NATO launched new attacks yesterday on Yugoslav army positions despite outrage over the bombing of the Chinese Embassy in Yugoslavia's capital.

Though hampered by bad weather, the alliance said in a statement issued in Brussels, Belgium, it had struck artillery and mortar positions, armored vehicles, other equipment and troops in Kosovo, a majority Albanian province of Yugoslavia's main republic, Serbia.

In Beijing, thousands besieged the U.S. Embassy yesterday for a second day, hurling rocks and chanting anti–NATO slogans during a daylong procession. Demonstrators also flocked to the Chinese Embassy's ruins in Belgrade.

NATO and Western leaders again apologized for the strike that Chinese officials said killed three journalists and injured more than 20. But the alliance pledged to continue its airstrikes until Yugoslav President Slobodan Milosevic accepts a Western–dictated peace plan for Kosovo.

The Pentagon and CIA, in a joint statement issued late Saturday in Washington, said the mistake was due to faulty intelligence that resulted in an error in the initial targeting.

Speaking on the 47th day of NATO airstrikes against Yugoslavia, alliance spokesman Jamie Shea said steps have been taken to minimize the likelihood it would happen again.

"We have dropped about 9,000 pieces or ordnance, either missiles or bombs. Only 12 have gone astray," he said. "You are talking about a fraction of one percent. So we continue to be accurate."

A Chinese Foreign Ministry delegation arrived in Belgrade to access the damage to the embassy. A spokesman for the Chinese delegation, Sun Yuxi, said his government was reserving judgment on whether the WASHINGTON (AP) — A CIA error that was based on faulty information and then went undetected in subsequent checks led to the mistaken NATO targeting and bombing of the Chinese Embassy in Belgrade, a U.S. official said yesterday.

The official, speaking on condition of anonymity, said the intended target, the Yugoslav Federal Directorate of Supply and Procurement, was chosen by the CIA. Other organizations, including NATO, the U.S. European Command

Student's play addresses mother's view on issues surrounding Prentice death

By Jake Lilsen

Adam Prentice

Valerie Lynch was studying abroad in Spain when she was told that Adam Prentice, one of her best friends since sixth grade, had died after falling through the roof of a campus greenhouse while intoxicated.

Being overseas, Lynch did not witness firsthand the media coverage of his death, which portrayed Prentice, a UMass honors student, as a reckless binge drinker. Since returning home, however, she has been researching the circumstances surrounding the night of the accident, as well as the police investigation that followed.

Last week, Lynch, a theater/elementary education major, unveiled her senior honors project — a play entitled, "What Really Happened to Adam Prentice?", which presented the struggle of Prentice's mother, Barbara, to determine the facts behind Adam's death.

Police maintain that Prentice, 21, was walking on the roof of the greenhouse after a night of drinking and partying, and accidentally fell through the roof. Prentice died of blood loss, much of which was caused by an eight inch shard of glass lodged in his back.

Since hearing of Adams' death, however, Barbara Prentice has insisted that foul play was involved. She, like Lynch, has studied the case exhaustively. Her anguish upon learning of his death, and various discrepancies discovered in her quest for the truth, are the focus of Lynch's play.

"I want to change peoples' ideas of what really went on," said Lynch. "Some people think he was just drunk, when in record that's not the case at all."

While Prentice was intoxicated at the time of his death, his mother insists that alcohol was not the reason for the greenhouse accident. She suspects that her son was murdered, pointing to the fact that the first officer at the scene of the accident declared that another individual was in the greenhouse at the time.

"We have evidence he wasn't alone, and the UMass police know he wasn't alone," she said.

This evidence is mentioned in Lynch's play, as well as various other actions of University police and emergency medical personnel that have aroused suspicion. In "What Really Happened to Adam Prentice?", junior theater major Cassandra Carroll, playing Barbara Prentice, wonders aloud why police cleaned the scene of the accident without collecting evidence, why they neglected to inform medical staff of a shard of glass lodged in Adam's back, and why, while dying of blood loss, Adam was never given a blood transfusion.

Many audience members were moved to tears by a scene in which three actors, playing students, joke about Adam being a "stumbling drunk" who "fell through the cracks." They tell the audience that "his mother should just get over it."

"It was hard to deal with the material every day," said Lynch. "And the reality of it is pretty gruesome, but for me it's more important other people know."

UMass Police Chief John Luippold, who helped handle the investigation, said he shares the hopes of Lynch and Mrs. Prentice that the play will "generate new leads."

"The investigation is still open," he said.

ACLU swamped with calls after Colorado shootings

By Amy Beth Graves
Associated Press

CLEVELAND — Eleven students are suspended for putting a satirical essay on their personal Web site. A teenager is sent to the police station for wearing black clothing. A student is interrogated about the chemistry book he's carrying.

Across the nation, American Civil Liberties Union offices say they're being swamped by complaints that nervous school officials are trampling students' constitutional rights since the April 20 shootings in Littleton, Colo.

"It seems to have become a witch hunt. I'm sure we've gotten hundreds of phone calls," said Ann Beeson, a staff attorney at the ACLU's national headquarters in New York. "Most school officials are not aware or not focusing on the fact that students are citizens, too."

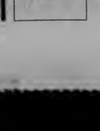
Greg Daniels of the ACLU in Ohio said the most serious of more than two dozen complaints to his office involved 11 students from Brimfield, a small town about 30 miles southeast of Cleveland. The students had a Web site for the Gothic subculture of youths who wear black, listen to rocker Marilyn Manson and think a lot about death.

The two Colorado gunmen embraced some Goth trappings but also exhibited racist attitudes and violence that most in the Goth world reject.

The Web site, filled with images of dragons and castles and dark poetry, had been created months before the Littleton shootings but was updated with comment on the massacre. The students called gunmen Eric Harris and Dylan Klebold fellow "freaks" and sarcastically praised them.

One statement read: "I wonder how long it'll be before we're allowed to wear our trenchcoats anymore. You know those screwed up kids in Colorado were wearing them, so that means I will also kill someone, and so will all my friends."

Timm Mackley, the school district's superintendent, said the Web site was obscene and had a threatening tone. He suspended the students, but the ACLU successfully fought their expulsion. "The students were engaging in protected speech, off campus," Daniels said. "The school says they can punish them for that type of speech and behavior. What's next? Regulating conversations off campus?"



A consultant on school security cautioned that while there may be some overreaction, heightened awareness now may be uncovering real threats that predate Littleton, as well as "spinoff–type incidents."

Pope's visit to Romania meant to unify Christians trip to Russia may be next

By Victor L. Simpson
Associated Press

BUCHAREST, Romania — Pope John Paul II pushed ahead yesterday with efforts to break down barriers that divide Christianity, calling on Orthodox Christians in Romania to "exchange the embrace of peace."

In the first visit by a Roman pontiff to a mainly Orthodox country in nearly 1,000 years, the pope embraced Romania's Orthodox patriarch and declared the time has come to put "every form of fear and suspicion" between their churches behind them.

The pope's three-day trip to Romania was also seen as a launching pad for John Paul's ambitious plans: a meeting with the patriarch of Russia, leader of the largest Orthodox church, and a trip to Moscow.

"The first time is always the hardest," papal spokesman Joaquin Navarro-Valls said yesterday.

The Romania trip "had more than opened the door" for better relations with Moscow, he said. "It's a breakthrough."

But he said there were still no concrete plans for a meeting with Moscow Patriarch Alexy II, who torpedoed a planned meeting with the pope at the last minute two years ago.

In a significant gesture by John Paul, Romanian Patriarch Teoctist announced the pope contributed an unspecified amount of money for construction of a massive Orthodox basilica in Bucharest.

Orthodox clergy have frequently accused the Vatican of spending its money to build its own churches and to convert Orthodox believers.

Some 100,000 people filled Union Square in the heart of Bucharest for the Orthodox service, the first such open-air service by the Orthodox church here. Most attending were Orthodox, but there were small groups of Catholics scattered in the crowd. Later in the day, Patriarch Teoctist attended a Roman Catholic Mass in a park, the pope's last public event before returning to Rome. At least 200,000 people turned out, most coming to Bucharest from Catholic areas in northern Transylvania.

In his afternoon homily, the pope said that until recently it would have been "unthinkable" for a Roman pontiff to visit Romania. "Today, after a long winter of suffering and persecution, we can finally exchange the embrace of peace and together praise the Lord."

At the end of the Mass, John Paul invited the Romanian patriarch to visit him at the Vatican.

Hearing these words, the crowd responded, shouting repeatedly: "Unity! Unity!"

Dozens of people passed out from heat exhaustion and not eating, doctors said. Others sung and murmured prayers, and a wooden fence collapsed as people surged forward to get a better view of the pope.

John Paul's trip was the first by a Roman pontiff to a mainly Orthodox country since the Eastern church definitively broke from Rome in the Great Schism of 1054.

The Polish-born pope, who will be 79 on May 18, has made reconciliation among Christians a principal goal for the start of Christianity's third millennium.

"I express the hope that Christians will find themselves, if not fully united, closer to full communion," the pope said earlier in the day.

In line with John Paul's frequent calls for Christians to recognize their sins of the past, the patriarch said Christians must recognize their responsibilities "for the suffering, the madness and the mistakes that they have provoked in the world over the centuries."

The 84-year-old patriarch, wearing white robes and a Byzantine miter, presided at the Divine Liturgy. John Paul followed the liturgy seated on the altar, then addressed the crowd at the end. John Paul, weakened by ailments over the years, leaned on his silver staff for support during the 3 1/2-hour service. He walked away slowly, giving his blessing as the crowd waved tiny Romanian and Vatican flags, but appeared to be bearing up. He departed for Rome yesterday night.

At the start of yesterday's service, Orthodox priests prayed for an end to the war in nearby Kosovo and for the hundreds of thousands of ethnic Albanians who have been forced to flee their homes.

bombing was an accident.

"We are condemning the act done by NATO with the U.S. playing the major part of NATO," he said. "We have relayed our protest and hope for the political process to take over."

A man Chinese officials said was the father of one of the journalists killed clutched his heart and sobbed. He had to be supported by one men on each side as he walked from the embassy grounds.

In another development, Russian envoy Viktor Chernomyrdin told Russian reporters that Kosovo Albanian leader Ibrahim Rugova was ready to go to Belgrade to hold talks with Milosevic on the future of the separatist province.

The Kosovo Liberation Army's news agency, meanwhile, denounced Rugova as a "special emissary of the criminal" government in Yugoslavia and no longer a representative of the Kosovo Albanian people.

Kosova Press criticized Rugova for not speaking out publicly about the suffering of the Kosovo Albanian people since his arrival in Rome last Wednesday as a "special guest" of the Italian government.

Meanwhile, Milo Djukanovic, president of the smaller of Yugoslavia's two republics, Montenegro, issued a joint statement with opposition activist Zoran Djindjic yesterday that called for radical democratic changes — once NATO airstrikes on Yugoslavia end.

The changes included isolating or cutting Milosevic off from his bases of support.

"It is impossible to imagine that democracy can be established in our country without a complete political transition in Serbia and Yugoslavia," said the statement, faxed to The Associated Press.

NATO said yesterday it had struck airfields, bridges, a TV transmitter site, radio relay sites, military barracks headquarters and petroleum sites in the previous 24 hours.

The state-run Tanjug news agency said the alliance had attacked Yugoslav army positions yesterday with cluster bombs in Djakovica in western Kosovo, causing extensive damage and sending ethnic Albanians fleeing. Further details were not immediately available, and the report could not be independently confirmed.

In northern Greece, scores of demonstrators broke into a NATO communications facility near the northern port Salonica in renewed protests against the alliance's bombing campaign. They damaged communications equipment, local media said.

NEW ORLEANS — A chartered bus carrying members of a casino club on a Mother's Day gambling excursion flipped off a highway yesterday morning, killing 21 people, authorities said. Sixteen were hospitalized, some in critical condition.

Mayor Marc Morial, who said it was the worst traffic accident in city history, announced the number of victims and said no names would be made public until relatives were notified.

The bodies were not all removed until the afternoon, four hours after the crash. "We have people on top of each other, crushed between twisted metal," police Officer Joe Narcisse said. The bus, traveling eastbound on Interstate 610, swerved from the left lane into the right lane, then crashed into an embankment at a tunnel for golf carts at the City Park course, police said. It then came to rest on a grassy area along the highway, which passes through a residential section of the city.

Terrell Walker, safety director for Custom Bus Charters, which chartered the bus for the trip to Casino Magic in Bay St. Louis, Miss., said the driver told him the bus swerved when it was cut off by another car.

A witness told the same story. Linda Watkins said she was driving behind the bus when a white car swerved in front and the bus changed lanes. Then the white car swerved back in front of the bus, which ran off the road and crashed up the embankment. "People started flying out of the bus, flying out the windows," she said.

Authorities said the accident happened shortly before 9 a.m. as the bus was headed for a casino on Mississippi's Gulf Coast. Walker said 46 people were on the bus, but the list of passengers was lost in the wreckage. Those aboard included members of an informal gambling club, many of them elderly, some in their 80s.

Four more people had been waiting to board the bus in New Orleans, including Charlene Schexnider, who has traveled with the group for years.

"I consider everybody on the bus my friend," she said. The front of the bus was so crumpled that its front wheels were two feet off the ground. Rescue squads had to brace the bus with timbers and use ladders to reach its windows.

Eight people were taken to Medical Center of Louisiana, all in critical condition, a spokesman for the hospital said. "Two of them are in very critical condition," said spokesman Jerry Romig. Others were taken to Tulane Medical Center, Methodist Hospital and Memorial Medical Center's Mercy campus, police said.

The people on the bus were members of a club who go to the casino twice a month, according to George Tassin, who said eight members of his family, mostly women on a Mother's Day trip, were on the bus.

Tassin's wife, daughter and an aunt were among the injured, he said as he waited outside the hospital where they were taken. He said his aunt was making her first trip since the recent death of her husband.

"My aunt finally decided to go this one time and this happened," he said.

Four gambling charter buses crashed in New Jersey en route to Atlantic City in late December and early January. One crash on Christmas Eve killed eight people and injured 15 others.

BRIDGE CREEK, Okla. — The bulldozers and chain saws were quiet as hundreds of worshipers gathered in a donated mud-covered tent yesterday for church services, almost a week after a deadly tornado ripped through this rural community.

Half of a cement-block wall was all that stood at the Ridgecrest Baptist Church. "God One, Tornado Zero" was written on a worker's hard hat.

"I don't know if God took your home, but a tornado did, and God will rebuild your life," Pastor Tom Duckett told the standing room only crowd. "I know that the church is the people. A building is just a building."

Bridge Creek, a collection of two churches, a school and 8,000 scattered residents, doesn't even appear on a map. It was here that a tornado started a journey Monday evening that ended with at least 41 dead statewide.

Eleven of the victims died in Bridge Creek.

Two people remained missing yesterday after two British tourists, who had been listed as unaccounted for, checked in with relatives in Australia and said they had moved beyond Oklahoma when the tornadoes hit.

In the Oklahoma City suburb of Moore, about 2,000 people gathered for a community-wide worship service.

"God will give us the strength to rebuild," Pastor Alan Cox of First Baptist Church told the Moore crowd, including Gov. Frank Keating and Rep. J.C. Watts, R-Okla. "It's all right to cry. It's all right to hurt. It's all right to be confused. Hope will rebuild landmarks. Hope will outlive the broken hearts."

Jerry Johns, president of Southwestern Insurance Information Service, said damage could top $1 billion once all the insurance claims have been filed. He said thousands of people have not filed claims yet. About 150,000 claims are expected, he said.

International News Briefs

JERUSALEM (AP) — Palestinian and Israeli officials held last-minute meetings yesterday over the closing of offices at the PLO's headquarters in Jerusalem, seeking to avert a confrontation days before Israeli elections.

Israeli police officials met with a lawyer for the Orient House headquarters past a 7 p.m. deadline set by Israel to shut down the complex if a compromise had not been worked out. American officials were also in touch with both sides to try and negotiate the dispute.

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu wants to shut down the complex, but Public Security Minister Avigdor Kahalani has proposed a compromise that calls for moving two departments out of the compound.

Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat met earlier with senior officials to discuss the compromise offer. The matter was also to be taken up by Netanyahu's inner Cabinet, which met late yesterday. Israel's Cabinet decided earlier this month to close three offices in the Orient House, saying they had ties to the Palestinian Authority that, under interim peace agreements, is not allowed to operate in Jerusalem.

The Palestinians have said the offices, including the negotiations department run by the top PLO official in the city, Faisal Husseini, are not connected to the Palestinian Authority. After meeting with Husseini on yesterday, Kahalani said the two sides were trying to find a compromise acceptable to both sides. "It will be best for all of us if the Israeli law is enacted, but on the other hand, we will do it in such a way that the peace process can continue," Kahalani said.

Closing the complex was likely to spark Israeli-Palestinian violence, which could affect the outcome of Israel's May 17 elections.

Israel says such meetings violate peace agreements. Palestinians rejected the demand, arguing that Husseini is a representative of the PLO and not Arafat's Palestinian Authority.

The Palestinian leadership wants to avoid an outbreak of violence and has accused Netanyahu, who is trailing in polls, of manipulating the issue in his campaign.

"They want to create an atmosphere of tension so that they can use it in the elections," chief Palestinian negotiator Saeb Erekat told The Associated Press.

Netanyahu, who depicts himself as being more dedicated than other candidates to keeping Jerusalem united under Israeli rule, swore earlier he would move ahead.

Price of gas rises in East, drops in West

CAMARILLO, Calif. (AP) — Gasoline prices dropped in the West as the effects of refinery problems wore off, but pump prices rose in other parts of the country due to crude oil price hikes, an industry analyst said yesterday.

Pump prices were up about 1 to 2 cents per gallon in the East and Midwest, while prices dropped about 5 cents in the West, according to the Lundberg Survey of 10,000 stations nationwide.

The national weighted average, including all grades and taxes, was $1.2337 per gallon Friday, a 0.41 cent rise from two weeks earlier, analyst Trilby Lundberg said.

Prices have risen more than 25 cents per gallon since they bottomed out on Feb. 19, but over the past month the increases have been very small, she said. "It looks like they are losing momentum."

A nationwide gasoline boycott organized for April 30 by consumer groups angry about price hikes succeeded in lowering sales on that day but may have had little long-term effect.

"Prices were down that day, but they were up the day before and the day after," Lundberg said.

Fatal explosions and problems in several California refineries caused prices to skyrocket in the West recently. However, increased supplies of gasoline have stabilized the market and are expected to continue knocking down prices in the West, she said.

OPEC and Mexico's decision to cut back on oil production may continue to force gas prices slightly higher in other regions, Lundberg said.

The average prices at self-service stations was $1.1767 per gallon for regular gasoline, $1.2783 for mid-grade and $1.3628 for premium.

Full-service prices were $1.5356 for regular, $1.6220 for mid-grade and $1.6954 for premium.

and the Pentagon's Joint Staff, reviewed and approved it, the official said.

"This went through all these hoops, but for whatever reason it was not detected," the official said of the mistake. The Chinese Embassy is several hundred yards away from the Yugoslav government supply office.

Most of the target planning in the allied air campaign is done by NATO, the U.S. European Command and the Pentagon, with the CIA playing a smaller role, the official said. CIA officials are still reviewing their own published and clandestine sources to determine how they misidentified the embassy, the official said.

NATO and President Clinton offered further apologies yesterday for the bombing, but no further information about how the mistake occurred or who was responsible.

Meanwhile, Rep. Porter Goss, R-Fla., chairman of the House intelligence committee, said the bombing shows that America's intelligence capabilities are stretched too thin and that such mistakes will happen as a result.

"I say it's a reaping of the harvest of the underinvestment in our intelligence capabilities," Goss said on "Fox News Sunday." Goss's Senate counterpart, Sen. Richard Shelby, R-Ala., agreed: "We've been doing defense, which intelligence is part and parcel of, on the cheap for about 15 straight years, and now you're seeing the fruits of it."

The administration is seeking about $29 billion for intelligence programs in the 2000 budget, an increase of about 9 percent. But critics say that proposed increase comes after years in which intelligence spending has effectively declined. Only a small portion of that budget goes to the CIA; much is for spy satellites and military intelligence.

Privatization will not pay our dues

When we look at the issue of privatization we see a multi- faceted one. What are we looking for: a mall-style Campus Center complex, or a community-grounded union/Campus Center?

Nobody in upper management tells you what privatization really is because they benefit from your ignorance.

Privatization or contract management is sought when there is a financial crisis where the resources from private companies are desired. The Campus Center and Student Union have a $19 million bill for deferred maintenance. That means, to update the complex to current standards, it would take $19 million.

Yes, we have a clear need for money. But meanwhile, the entire campus has $2 billion dollars worth of deferred maintenance. How are we going to get it? If the trustees are trying to get $19 million from private companies for the Campus Center, they could sell the UMass campus to Nike, Westinghouse, or Disney for the bargain price of $2 billion. It may sound outrageous, but "outrageous" is a good word for the idea of privatizing the Campus Center.

"If a private company moves into the Campus Center, their funding comes from you, the consumer."

Dan Thomases

[illegible] moves into the Campus Center, their funding comes from you, the consumer. The solution of privatization does not mean that magic money will come from some corporation to pay our dues. You will shop at these private businesses, and the money you spend will pay instead.

"Privatization is a back doorway around raising student fees." This was stated at one of the late-March information sessions. I couldn't agree more. You will see an increase in prices and fewer used books and buybacks from the Textbook Annex.

There are certainly problems with the current management of the Campus Center/Student Union food services. But they are doing a pretty darn good job for what they have to work with. Last semester I went to a workshop where I was one in a crowd of many of their staff members. The stories they told of the pressure and conditions in which they work would make you surprised the mail arrives on time. They are overworked and underpaid, poorly managed — because lower management is not given any time to evaluate or train their understaffed team of employees. How can we expect this to be successful and [illegible] the Campus Center Student Union's budgetary needs? We should not even be asking it to. And replacing these services with the expectation that private companies will do a better job is insulting.

So what do we gain from privatization? Higher prices and a business to "pay" our debts. And what do we lose? Control of our services, ownership of these spaces, workstudy jobs, jobs for students with international visas, unionized staff member jobs, and student businesses.

How will we lose the student businesses? These student- run operations rely heavily on location. Where do you go for your morning coffee and bagel? People's Market? The Blue Wall? Maybe you go to the closest one. But if you have a commitment to purchasing your goods from the student businesses, where did it come from? You heard about them or saw them — maybe it took you a while to find them. If private businesses get their pick of spaces, they will choose the most advantageous spots to bring in more consumers in order to sell, sell, sell. The student businesses will slowly subside with the passing of time, hidden in the shadows of the new businesses.

Do you see how complex this is? I am barely touching on the damage privatization will cause. Be a concerned voice: tell the Chancellor and the trustees. Privatization will not pay for our dues. And we will not blindly pay private businesses to dust over the University's budget problems. Speak loud. No privatization at UMass!

Dan Thomases is a UMass student.

A life on hold

The call came in late. Jesus sat at his desk, filing through applications for miracles, when the phone rang.

"Mr. Christ, you have a Mr. Koenig on line three."

"Hmm... Okay, put him through."

Jesus took a few seconds to punch up "Koenig" on his PC. He reviewed the names that came up on his screen, and picked up the phone.

"First name, please."

"Seth."

"Hold, please."

The savior then selected "Seth" from the list on his screen while the man on the line listened to the muzak version of "Jesus He Knows Me" by Genesis. The personal display was not terribly flattering.

"Okay, Seth Koenig — 19 years old. Communications major from UMass — what's your story?"

"Well, Jesus, here it is: I've got problems."

"Point, please."

"My bills are all due, and I don't have much cash."

"What else?"

"Well, my term papers and finals are starting to be assigned, and I really don't have the time."

"(Sigh.) Mr. Koenig, I'm sure you're really feeling badly now, but you've got to understand, I receive over 400 trillion miracle applications every day. If you need a miracle, you'll just have to go through the same process everyone else does. Please pick up a form at the local church in... Am-hurst."

"That's Am-erst. The H is silent."

"Whatever. Look, I'd love to talk to you, but there are other, more pressing matters that I've got to deal with — you know, volcanoes, international conflicts, Richard Simmons; all sorts of things..."

"B-b-but wait! There's more!"

Jesus clears his throat. This better be good...

"I need to find one of those tourist vanity license plates with 'Seth' on it. Hell, get me a vanity pen or a magnet or anything. I can't find one for the life of me, and I've been around."

"At a New Jersey rest stop last weekend, I found plates that said 'Umberto', 'Xaviera', and 'Fritz' Fritz! No 'Seth.' Obviously, the folks over at Vanity stuff, Inc. need to cover all the common names, like Tom, Dick and Xaviera, but for all the Seths out there — well, there's no room in the budget for that, I guess. Is Seth that uncommon a name? Come on."

"(Sigh again) no, Seth is a common name. It was the third son of Adam and Eve, a very important person in the Bible. Please don't say, 'Hell.' Now, look, I've got to go..."

Seth Koenig

"No! I've got more! The Bruins made it past the first round of the playoffs, and I was wondering if we could get a Stanley Cup."

"Everybody wants one of those. Mr. Koenig, I've got sinners to strike down with lightning. Would you please just pick up an application and..."

"Then there's that mustard stain I got on my new shirt, and I haven't gotten any action in months."

"Sex before marriage is no good. While we're at it, why haven't you been to church since (scrolls screen down)... you were five years old. I have half the mind to have a car hit you on your way home tonight."

"Yeah, my bad. How about that stain?"

"Jesus Christ, Mr. Koenig, I've got things to do!"

Finally, Jesus just put Mr. Koenig on hold again, and he smiled as he realized just how versatile his own name had become. He figured the annoying man would eventually get bored and go away. So many people bitch about such minuscule things. They have no idea just how bad it can really get.

Seth Koenig is a Collegian columnist.

"Then there's that mustard stain I got on my new shirt, and I haven't gotten any action in months."

Just so you know...

Hey You! Yeah, you! The tour group! I know you're reading this right now, because I always see you stalking around campus with your parents and U-Store bags stuffed full of crap and, of course, copies of this esteemed publication. I know you see me, as well, because you always stare at my t-shirts as I walk by as though they contain a recipe for Meaning of Life Stew, instead of what they actually have on them, which is usually something wholesome like "Slayer" or simply "I Butt-&%^% Yo (%$&$#$%ing Momma And All I Got Was This %^&%&$^ T-Shirt."

Rob Schulze

So anyway, tour group, this column is for you. You see, I know you thirst for information about this fine institute of higher education. So, for you, I have decided to disclose some of the very cool things on campus, so that you will all want to come here and buy me drinks. I also wish to stress that I am doing this out of simple love for the University, and not by any means because President Bulger gave me a really sexy massage.

Definitely high on the list of cool things is the Coffee Shop in the Campus Center. This place makes the best damn cheeseburgers in the known universe, and they do it right before your eyes, so that you can see the short-order magic at work. Then there's that blonde guy who, when he hands you your order, always tells you to "Have a good day, now" no matter how busy it is or how much of a jerk you were to him. I saw this one girl bitch him out over the lettuce on her chicken sandwich or something equally stupid, and he still told her to "Have a good day, now" and really sounded like he meant it. Gotta love that.

I am also a big fan of the Basics dining commons. Short lines, higher quality food, comfy chairs, and they usually have French salad dressing, of which there is a serious shortage on this campus. They're open past seven, too. If you can believe that. Basically (get it?) It's just too sweet.

This one is related to Basics. There are legions of girls — these being the girls with the neon hair and the 1950's-style glasses with the thick black frames — who go to Basics and eat only very small portions of only vegetarian and organic foods, with no salad dressing or gravy or anything; not even any milk, for Chrissakes. These same girls will then get up from this ultra-healthy whole-grain meal and go outside, where they will, with one clean and practiced motion, light up smokestack-sized unfiltered cigarettes. I love these girls. Seriously, girls: You know who you are, and I love you. You make me laugh.

This space here is reserved for WMUA. Can you believe this station is 50 years old? My old man isn't 50! This alliance of soft rock and UMass sports is hard to beat. Perfect for when you have a "headache" (wink wink, elbow elbow) or simply want some real Courtney Love-free relaxation. I'd take Ezra over Howard Stern in a DJ Deathmatch any day.

"I know that I, for one, would feel stifled at an institution in which there was no outlet for my inherent inner funk."

Goodell. 'Nuff said, right? Amongst the various ugly-ass Fine Arts Centers and Grad Towers, Goodell shined like a Glow Worm. From the dome on top to the marble stairs inside and the great pictures on the walls, Goodell just feels like a classy higher-education building. I'd take Goodell over any Amherst College building, even the dorms.

Let me not forget the "Funk Team." If you were anything like me, oh touring pre-frosh, the one thing that was always on your mind as you were filling out applications and pouring over moldy old college guides was "Are any of these schools funky?" I know that I, for one, would feel stifled at an institution in which there was no outlet for my inherent inner funk. Well let me reassure you, young person, that UMass is not only a certified funk-a-porium, but we have an official group of young ladies whose whole job is to go out at Midnight Madness and get the funk out. It makes me proud.

As my space runs out, I feel the need to squeeze just a few more things in here: The campus pond is beautiful. Blue Wall ice cream rules. Orchard Hill is a great place to call home. Call boxes are ideal for prank calls. Reading Room couches are bliss. UMass bands rock. Minutemen hockey games are a blast. I like to get naked.

~Letters to the Editor~

Spring's article had the right idea

To the editor:

Dear Mr. Spring. Thank you for a very provocative and moving article in the April 29 edition of the Collegian about Ms. Tamara Saratlic. The war in Yugoslavia is affecting millions of people around the world, from Novi Sad to Kosovo, right here on campus. It is very important for us as students and Americans to understand the real life implications that the conflict has on all the people of the Balkan region. I appreciate your diversion from the media status quo that chooses to demonize the Serbs as ruthless supporters of ethnic cleansing and not as a people who must endure both an oppressive government and attacks by an aggressive NATO.

It is clear that neither Milosevic nor NATO see the reality of Kosovo, a reality which involves the lives of millions of individuals who should not be targeted by government police for their ethnicity, nor should they be targeted by NATO warplanes because they are Serbian. It is the average person — whether a Kosovar Albanian grandmother in a refugee camp, a young Serbian student pressed into military service, or one of UMass' top rowers — who are all severely affected by the actions of both sides.

The ethnocentrism of the Belgrade regime to forcefully "cleanse" the "jewel of Serbia" for the Serbs is equal in stature to the ethnocentrism of the U.S. policy to bomb Yugoslavia back to the Stone Age with complete disregard for strategic value of targets or collateral damage.

Thank you once again for reporting on the effects the war has had on innocent Serbs. It is good to see a balance which shows that all the people of Yugoslavia, not just the Kosovars, are suffering from both Milosevic's evil government as well as the U.S.' misguided, belated and ignorant attempt to resolve the conflict through force.

Mummy unwraps the goods

Spielberg-inspired film high on comedy

By Bryan McAllister
Collegian Staff

THE MUMMY
Directed by Stephen Sommers with Brendan Fraser, Rachel Weisz, John Hannah
Playing at Mountain Farms Theaters

COURTESY MARSHA BLACKBURN

Brendan Fraser plays Rick O'Connell, hero of The Mummy.

If there's one rule of cheesy special effects movies, it's that you can't go wrong if you include a lot of bugs. The Mummy has a lot of bugs.

It also has a lot of Steven Spielbergian influence, taking plentifully from Raiders of the Lost Ark — the dusty, sandy structures of Egypt, the 1920's tan-and-white clothing, the love-hate relationship between the rugged adventurer and the clumsy damsel in distress, the evil, supernatural powers of antiquity — all these are lovingly stolen from the work of our most famous director. But this is certainly the best rip- off in the long history of bad rip-offs.

The last time this director, Stephen Sommers, made a movie, it was called Deep Rising, and it sucked. Really sucked. It was done in the tradition of those old B-movies, featuring some really bad special effects and some even worse acting and dialogue. There's been a lot of those type of movies these days, and rarely have they been done right. The Relic, Lost in Space, Virus, Anaconda, and Species have all tried and failed to capture the right tone set way before by Spielberg, James Cameron and George Lucas.

That tone is — recycle old 1940's adventure serials with better special effects, and don't take yourself too seriously. Raiders was essentially a comedy, playing off action movie cliches and filmed in a campy, tongue-in-cheek style. The Mummy is not nearly as well crafted and layered, but the tone is perfect.

There is, for instance, an Indiana Jones here, played by Brendan Fraser In his non-goofiest role. Fraser has to utter a lot of Hollywood catch-phrases like "This just keeps getting better and better" which essentially is Harrison Ford's "I have a bad feeling about this." But he also gets some of the coolest fighting scenes since Raiders — at one point, his sword reaches up to attack a mummy and picks off the head of a would-be attacker. At another point, Fraser sends off a bad guy simply by growling at him, and this gag is developed throughout the film.

It's obvious, then, that for once, the filmmakers really had a lot of fun crafting their movie. They set it back in the 1920's in locations around Egypt, where Fraser's character, O'Connell, meets up with a clumsy, beautiful librarian (Rachel Wiesz). It's obvious from the start that Fraser and Weisz will end up together, but that's part of The Mummy's allure — you know exactly what will happen, you've seen it all before, but it still seems as fun.

John Hannah, for instance, seen before as Gwyneth Paltrow's love interest in the underrated Sliding Doors, plays the goofy sidekick and has a couple of hilarious scenes, the best being one where he pretends to be a bunch of Egyptian zombies.

If you haven't figured it out yet, the best parts of The Mummy are not the special effects, which at times are impressive and at times formulaic and too computer generated. The best parts are in the genuinely funny script, in the exotic locations, in the spirit of adventure that the actors bring to it.

In fact, it's a credit to Sommers that he keeps his action cartoonish and not gory or horrific. The Mummy is never scary. Taking a cue from Spielberg, the director cuts away or fades out on a killing scene, or shows only glimpses of it.

The Mummy itself is Imhotep (Arnold Vosloo), who in the opening sequence is seen being mummified. When Fraser, Wiesz and other adventurers find a map leading to Dinner and movie in New Bedford

NEW BEDFORD — Cinema 140, looking to carve a niche amid growing competition, is exploring the possibility of becoming a pub cinema.

"Instead of scrambling to eat dinner and get to the movie on time, you could do both at one place" said Terri Cabral, general manager at the six-screen complex on Hathaway Road. "We think it's a great concept."

She said the owners of Cinema 140 are looking at the feasibility

the lost city of the dead and uncover its secrets, the Mummy is unleashed along with the 10 plagues of Egypt, which aren't really that bad if you just stay indoors.

Such is the way with The Mummy — nothing really makes much sense. Characters disappear and reappear without explanation, and read out of ancient books with not too much hassle. But this creates wonderfully cheesy moments, like when Weisz declares, after translating a book, "Take that Bainbridge scholars!"

Go rent Raiders again, and then go see The Mummy, and by the time you're through, ancient maps, pyramids and scathing deserts will be romantic all over again, and you'll really start wondering where all the sarcastic adventurers and beautiful librarians went to. B

Stephen Sommers directs The Mummy, the number one movie at the box office over the weekend.

Box-office Results

By Anthony Breznican
Associated Press

LOS ANGELES — Defying analysts, critics and The Force, The Mummy bagged this year's biggest opening weekend at the box office with $44.6 million to kick off the blockbuster movie season.

The cat-burglar caper Entrapment slipped to second place with $12.2 million and the cyberspace adventure The Matrix fell to third with $6 million, estimates showed yesterday.

With lukewarm reviews, many expected The Mummy, a special effects-filled story of an ancient Egyptian priest who returns from the dead to do unfinished business before dropping out of sight when the Star Wars prequel opens on May 19.

"Actually, it probably did three times as much business as people were expecting," said Robert Buckebaum, a movie analyst with Reel Source Inc.

Some films have been [illegible] around the [illegible] this weekend [illegible] appeal," he said.

"When you finally get a release like this, everybody goes wild."

With most studios giving a wide berth to the release of Star Wars: Episode I - The Phantom Menace, Universal Pictures' move to open The Mummy just 12 days before-hand may pay off if word-of-mouth from audiences is favorable.

The Mummy — which also had the best non-summer opening ever — was an impressive showing for star Brendan Fraser and easily beat his previous high opening of $16.5 million for George of the Jungle.

Also opening in wide release this weekend was the high school student government satire Election, starring Reese Witherspoon as a compulsive do-gooder and Matthew Broderick as a frumpy civics teacher.

The film opened in only a handful of theaters three weeks ago and rode a wave of positive reviews to fifth place this weekend with $3.3 million for seventh place. It has grossed a total of $10.9 million in 10 weeks.

Estimated grosses for Friday through yesterday at North American theaters, according to Exhibitor Relations Inc., with final figures to be released Monday:

1. The Mummy, $44.6 million.
2. Entrapment, $12.2 million.
3. The Matrix, $6 million.
4. Life, $3.5 million.
5. Election, $3.3 million.
6. Never Been Kissed, $3 million.
7. Analyze This, $1.8 million.
8. 10 Things I Hate About You, $1.2 million.
9. Cookie's Fortune, $900,000.
10. Shakespeare in Love, $765,000.

of the move as one way to ward off increased competition from the planned entry of Boston-based Flagship Cinemas into the SouthCoast theater market. The chain plans to open a new 12-theater complex featuring stadium-style seating at the former Stuart's department store off Kings Highway — a few short miles from Cinema 140.

"We have architects looking at it and have been looking to line up a restaurant that might be interested in participating," she said. "It would be a place where people can come in and have dinner while watching a movie."

The sandwiches, hamburger plates and appetizers, along with beer, wine or soda, would be served to patrons while they are watching a film.

"It would not be upscale," said Cabral, "and we wouldn't have full-course meals."

Patrons who wished to attend just the movie could do so since meals would be priced separately. Cabral said the plan is to keep ticket prices comparable to current costs.

The move would also be contingent upon the cinema's ability to continue getting its share of first-run movies.

The Cinema 140 pub-style theater would be the first of its kind in the SouthCoast area, but not in the state.

A pub cinema recently opened in North Attleboro in a former Stop & Shop Plaza.

Bellingham restaurateur Christopher Ballarino opened up Pub Cinema on Route 1 in North Attleboro in February, offering second-run films.

While the theater's lobby remains conventional, entering the two theaters moviegoers will find swivel chairs grouped around a series of tables that are built on platforms to provide different elevations and sight lines.

Ballarino manages the movies and his restaurant chef does the ordering and sets up the menu for the pub dining.

"We have people coming in off the street every day to check it out," he said.

"Everyone who comes seems to enjoy it and we've done pretty well so far."

"We've got people coming from Providence," he said. "It's such a novel idea in this area that people don't mind traveling half an hour or 45 minutes."

Ballarino got the idea a few years back while attending school in Orlando, Fla., where he regularly attended movies at a similar theater.

"I always wondered why we didn't have them up here," he said.

A year ago he passed the Stop & Shop Plaza on Route 1 and noticed the landlord was looking to subdivide the property, he eventually negotiated a lease for theater space.

Cabral said a decision by Cinema 140 owners, the Samia Cos. of Brighton, should be made this summer on whether to proceed with the project. If so, the conversion, which she estimated will cost $500,000, could be completed by the end of the year.

She said the cinema could likely be able to operate during the conversion by focusing on one theater at a time.

Together with Cinema 140's six screens and the recently enlarged twelve-screen General Cinema at the North Dartmouth Mall, Flagship Cinemas will bring to 30 the number of screens in Greater New Bedford for first-run movies. The Bijou Theater in Fairhaven offers discount seating prices for films already released.

Flagship Cinemas, which is spending millions to renovate the Stuart's store, will feature stadium seating, a new trend in cinema that features a higher rise of seating for better sight lines and sound reception.

"It looks like chaos right now, but we are right on schedule," said John Crowley, president of Flagship Cinemas. "We're just waiting on them for installing the chairs and screens."

He said the theater will offer viewers better sound, better sight and better screens, along with comfortable seating.

"I think the city really needs it and deserves it," he added. "I think the technology in the last 10 years has really outstripped what the older theaters have."

He also said he does not believe the firm's entry into the area will saturate the market with movie houses.

Cabral isn't so optimistic, but believes a pub cinema would offer moviegoers yet another type of new movie experience.

"We have to change, because we all have to offer something different," Cabral said.

Information and Instructions for Seniors About the Commencement Ceremony

129th UNDERGRADUATE COMMENCEMENT
May 23, 1999

May 3, 1999

• UNDERGRADUATE COMMENCEMENT • FINAL INFORMATION AND INSTRUCTIONS •

The following general information and instructions will help you attend [illegible] Commencement ceremony. Since there is no pre-Commencement rehearsal, it is VERY important that you take the time to review it. Although commencement ceremony experience indicates that your attention to the necessary details will help to ensure that the ceremony will begin and end on time and with minimal confusion. It supplements the information brochure which was mailed to seniors of record as of February 16, 1999. I hope you will find it to be helpful. Please especially note Section F concerning traffic and routes to campus!

On arrival at the Stadium, Marshals will assist you and answer any questions you may have. They will also prepare you for the Student Processional, escort you onto the field, and to designated seats. Please cooperate with these unpaid volunteers throughout the ceremony.

The Student Processional will begin at approximately 10:10 a.m. The ceremony begins at 10:30 a.m. and will conclude at approximately Noon. In case of heavy rain, selected portions of the ceremony may be shortened or eliminated, but the ceremony will not be delayed or moved.

While the Commencement ceremony is, in part, a celebration, it is also a formal event. There are several significant ways in which you can contribute to its success. Perhaps, most important, is to observe regulations concerning alcohol. Abuses in the past unfortunately spoiled the day for many, subjecting the graduates and the University to public criticism.

Further, to preserve the tradition and the dignity of this event, please be respectful to the speakers and honorary degree recipients. Several are UMass graduates and all of them are distinguished individuals, here at our invitation, and deserving of your attentiveness.

The Commencement Planning Committee, several hundred other employees, and many unpaid volunteers, have devoted considerable time and effort, some for more than a year, to ensuring the success of this important day. We are committed to doing all that we can do to make it as memorable, enjoyable, and meaningful as possible for you as well as for your guests. We ask for your cooperation in making it a day in which we can all take pride.

Thank you, and congratulations on behalf of the Planning Committee as well as the entire University community.

Robert N. Brooks, Director
Student Affairs Special Services
Commencement Coordinator

Office of the Chancellor May 3, 1999

To the Class of 1999,

Within a few weeks the completion of your undergraduate years will officially be recognized as the University celebrates - with you - its one hundred and twenty-ninth commencement.

In 1871, the first class of the then Massachusetts Agricultural College graduated 27 individuals, all with Bachelor of Science degrees in a very limited number of majors. Many went on to distinguished careers in the Commonwealth. Their record of distinctive accomplishments helped to establish the notable reputation of what became, in 1947, the University of Massachusetts.

And now, in 1999, more than 4,000 of you, in nearly 100 different majors, will be graduating and making your marks not only in the Commonwealth but also throughout the United States and, indeed, around the world.

On behalf of the faculty and staff, I congratulate you for having successfully fulfilled the demanding course of study leading to your degree. I know it is the result of considerable hard work, and you have every right to be as proud of your achievement as we are of you.

I look forward to joining with you, your families, and friends on May 23 to commemorate and applaud your academic accomplishments.

Best wishes to you and the best of luck in the future. And don't forget to come back to visit, for you are always welcome here.

Sincerely,

David K. Scott
Chancellor

Hasek helps down the Bruins; Series tied heading to Buffalo

By Howard Ulman
AP Sports Writer

BOSTON — Dominik Hasek is hot again and tempers may soon reach the boiling point now that Buffalo has gained a hard-hitting split of its first two playoff games in Boston.

The Sabres beat the Bruins 3-1 yesterday as Hasek stopped 28 shots and Michael Peca, Curtis Brown and Dixon Ward scored for Buffalo, which rebounded from a 4-2 opening loss.

"I thought he played good," Buffalo coach Lindy Ruff said of Hasek, the NHL's two-time defending MVP. "I thought he played real good."

Hasek was headed for his fifth career playoff shutout before Don Sweeney's power-play goal with 5:57 left cut the lead to 2-1. The Sabres survived another power play and restored the two-goal margin on Ward's empty-net goal with 37 seconds remaining.

"This was the most important game of the season for us," Brown said. "It didn't matter how we won. We just had to get the win." The Sabres will have the home crowd behind them in Wednesday night's third game of the best-of-7 Eastern Conference semifinal. And they may have the Bruins pounding them.

Boston's players were upset when Alexei Zhitnik smacked Bruins captain Ray Bourque into the boards from behind late in the second period.

"It was a dirty hit. That's for sure," Bourque said. "There's a lot more games to play. You can dish it out. Sometimes you find yourself on the other side of those hits."

Zhitnik, who drew a two-minute penalty, said he didn't intend to hurt Bourque.

"If I wanted to injure him," Zhitnik said, "he wouldn't be playing anymore."

Tune in Wednesday for the next round.

"If they take a run at our best player, they should expect the same thing back," Boston's Rob DiMaio said.

The Bruins have a more important task: winning in a building where they are 1-7-1 in their last nine games, including 0-3 this season.

"A lot of teams are winning on the road," Bourque said, "but it's going to be tough."

Especially if the Sabres start the game as aggressively as they did yesterday. Peca scored 1:51 into the game and Buffalo outshot Boston 17-5 in the first period.

"The first half of the game was our best effort in the playoffs," Hasek said. "We outskated them and outhit them. I'm sure Boston will be ready the next game."

The Sabres hope Miroslav Satan, who led them with 40 regular-season goals, will be also after missing his third straight game with a bruised foot.

Peca and Brown provided the offense with their second playoff goals. Brown's came during a two-man advantage at 5:57 of the second period.

Sweeney made it 2-1 with his second playoff goal with a rising 30-foot shot from the left while Hasek was on his knees in the crease.

That seemed to energize the Bruins, who dominated the rest of the game but couldn't beat Hasek again even though they had another power play with 2:44 remaining.

The loss ended Boston's four-game winning streak, including the last three games of its opening-round win over Carolina, and gave Buffalo home-ice advantage in the series.

Hasek was the key to Buffalo reaching the Eastern Conference finals last year and his role hasn't changed for a Sabres team that relies on tight checking and mediocre offense.

His nine regular-season shutouts were second only to the 10 recorded by Boston's Byron Dafoe.

Hasek wasn't spectacular in the first period but didn't need to be as he faced just five shots. The Bruins had been outshot 21-10 before Zhitnik was penalized at 14:57 of the second period. Peca then drew a roughing penalty at 16:54 and Zhitnik went back into the penalty box at 17:12 for hitting Bourque.

That gave the Bruins a two-man advantage for 1:42, but they managed just three shots. Hasek's best save in that stretch came on a 5-footer by Dmitri Khristich. Then with 7:46 left in the game, Hasek sprawled to corral a rebound of Kyle McLaren's 45-foot blast. Hasek's quickest move may have come at 5:01 of the third period when he covered the puck with his glove before McLaren jabbed at it. Hasek, along with several teammates, chased McLaren into the corner where players clutched each other, McLaren and Buffalo's Jay McKee were penalized.

Redwings shutout Av's; lead series 2–0 after two in Colorado

By John Mossman
AP Sports Writer

DENVER — On his 34th birthday, Steve Yzerman lit two candles — at the expense of Colorado goaltender Patrick Roy. Yzerman scored two goals and Bill Ranford gained his fourth career playoff shutout as the Detroit Red Wings beat Colorado 4-0 on yesterday to take a 2-0 series lead.

Games 3 and 4 of the Western Conference semifinal are scheduled for Detroit on Tuesday and Thursday.

"I have spent better birthdays," Yzerman said teasingly, "but I won't tell you what happened. It wasn't with a bunch of sports reporters."

In a game featuring the sort of fierce hitting that has come to define this rivalry, the Red Wings stayed unbeaten in these playoffs. They registered their sixth straight playoff victory and 11th straight since last year's postseason.

Detroit, seeking a third consecutive Stanley Cup title, gave coach Scotty Bowman his 200th career playoff win — extending his NHL record.

Bowman, who entered this year's playoffs with 194 wins, said, "I knew if we won six games this year, I'd feel very good. If not, I'd feel very bad. Somebody reminded me before the playoffs, but that's the only time I've thought about it. I worry more about the 111 losses."

Yzerman, the Red Wings' captain, scored in each of the first two periods, giving him eight goals in the playoffs to equal a career high. Nicklas Lidstrom and Wendel Clark added power-play goals in the final period.

Ranford, the 1990 NHL playoff MVP with Edmonton, started his second straight game in goal in place of the injured Chris Osgood, who is out with a sprained right knee. He had 28 saves, preserving his shutout with a diving save to rob Peter Forsberg late in the first period and with back-to-back stops on Theo Fleury and Sylvain Lefebvre in the third.

Yzerman chided the media for dismissing Ranford, a late-season acquisition from Tampa Bay.

"You've got to remember that this guy has won a couple of Cups," Yzerman said. "He is a Conn Smythe winner. Just because he hasn't been in the playoffs in a couple of years, you guys sound like you are amazed. He is a great, quality goaltender."

Ranford insisted he was "lucky. The guys played unbelievably in front of me. There were times when I didn't see the puck, and they were able to block it out for me. That first power-play goal we got in the third period took the wind out of their sails."

Roy had 33 saves.

In what could be the final hockey game at McNichols Arena — which will be replaced by the new Pepsi Center next fall — the Avalanche went meekly, generating few serious scoring chances and again failing to get production from their third and fourth lines. Since scoring two goals in the first period of Game 1, the Avalanche's scoreless streak has extended to 111 minutes, 44 seconds.

UMass goal keeper Tara Durkin looks at transfer options

By Paul Teves
Collegian Staff

Sophomore netminder Tara Durkin decided near the end of this season that she will transfer from UMass for academic reasons.

Durkin is looking to find a school where she can study her major of economics as well as play lacrosse. The Massachusetts women's lacrosse backup keeper is currently considering North Carolina, Notre Dame and UConn.

"The move is purely academic, I'm here for academics and I don't care if I sit anywhere, I just need my major," Durkin said.

The sophomore is currently under contract with the School of Management, but is looking to get into a school directly as an Econ major instead of playing this waiting game.

"I was hoping to get directly admitted with a major. Another factor is the overall academic reputation of the school, and that's why I'm currently leaning towards UNC and Notre Dame," Durkin said. "That isn't the only reason but a lot of little reasons like that is what makes this move so important."

COURTESY MEDIA RELATIONS

Tara Durkin

The sophomore cage keeper started the season as the starting goalkeeper and played solid, then the Minutewomen went through a tough period while they were losing players to injury and needed to switch it up on various occasions. Durkin also suffered a mild concussion during a game against Hofstra, which kept her out a couple of games, and gave Jen Nardi an opportunity to get solid playing time, which was just what she needed to get going.

Durkin's number were very solid during the time she played this season. The Jenkintown, Pa. native competed in nine games this season of which five games were starts. During that time Durkin compiled one of the better save percentages in the country, as she made 75 saves on 132 shots faced for a percentage of .615. While the percentage was good she didn't play enough minutes to be ranked with the other keepers in the country.

Durkin also did a fine job keeping the ball out of the net in general, as she allowed a mere 7.83 goals against this season which was good enough for a 5–2 record.

Durkin also did a tremendous job in the time she spent in the cage in her freshman campaign. She allowed only 6.31 goals per game, and had a save percentage of .689 in eight games played of which four were starts. Her play allowed her to post an impressive 3–0 mark in her freshman campaign.

Unlike other sports, women's lacrosse doesn't provide a lucrative future in the professional scene, which is why it's refreshing to see an athlete looking out for their educational future, which is what Durkin is doing.

Durkin's play will be sorely missed by the Minutewomen, whether it was in a starting role or in a solid back up position — the stability that Durkin provided for the Minutewomen will be a huge loss.

Durkin's numbers should mean a dramatic improvement for any of the teams which she is thinking of playing for.

Durkin's fine stats would be a solid addition at UNC, where the netminders are tremendous, but they are losing Debbie Castine who played a majority of UNC's games and had a 6.33 GAA. Current back up redshirt freshman Melissa Coyne has been OK but not spectacular.

"At the moment I'm really leaning towards UNC, and it would be a new transition playing for a team ranked slightly higher nationally," Durkin said. "But my goal isn't to go down there and start, my goal is to be part of the team and it's honestly more the academics of the thing."

McClellan is slightly overworked.

"I think that she still has the same intensity," Gorski said. "She's very motivated, she really wanted to win this year. She loves what she does so much that [the pregnancy] wouldn't stop her.

She's got this great love for the game, and I don't think that it's slowed her down. She was always there when we needed her and when we needed to talk."

Said Miele: "I really thought she was going to have her baby during the season, so I was kind of scared. [However], I don't really see her as being that different... Francesca's a great coach."

COURTESY MEDIA RELATIONS

Francesca McClellan

Overall, the season was a learning experience — for McClellan and her players.

"She tells us a lot of stories about Elizabeth, and it just makes her so happy. It's really cool," Anderson said. "She tells us when it's kicking and everything. She's very open about her pregnancy — I mean, we've all felt her stomach."

Everyone in the women's lacrosse program has benefitted in the long run from the year that the coach has had. The Minutewomen overcame adversity to record their second consecutive nine-win season, and the individuals therein had someone to lean on when the going got tough.

Oh, and the world will be getting a brand new life.

Horoscopes

TAURUS (April 20–May 20) — You can enjoy a tremendous attraction between you and a member of the opposite sex, but work is the place where this can benefit you most.

GEMINI (May 21–June 20) — You may not have the energy you were counting on today, so it is best that you take things more slowly than planned. Be patient with yourself.

CANCER (June 21–July 22) — You must strive to avoid any head–on confrontations if at all possible. You can see to it that harmony reins as long as you maintain your charm.

LEO (July 23–Aug. 22) — Your stamina will see you through today, though toward the end you may find your creativity at its lowest level in weeks. Rest up!

VIRGO (Aug. 23–Sept. 22) — Your supporters are sure to give you the assistance you need today, and just in time! Don't think that it won't come just because you have to wait.

LIBRA (Sept. 23–Oct. 22) — It is important that you remain open and receptive no matter what comes your way today. Some may be defensive, but you can't afford to be!

SCORPIO (Oct. 23–Nov. 21) — Take care that you're not so eager to impress that you become intrusive or overbearing. Remember, the less you say, the more they'll want to hear.

SAGITARIUS (Nov. 22–Dec. 21) — The pressure is on today, as someone close to you mounts a challenge requiring you to turn on the heat and bring your talents to bear.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22–Jan. 19) — You can trust the people working with you today, but you may have to clarify your expectations and instructions. Good communication is the key to success.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20–Feb. 18) — You may be on a rather short fuse today, so you'll want to avoid any persons or situations that you know will try your patience.

PISCES (Feb. 19–March 20) — You mustn't be so protective of yourself and those around you that your instinct is to say "no" to every new opportunity today.

ARIES (March 21–April 19) — You won't be able to forget someone from your own past today, as he or she will be apparent to you again and again at the most unlikely moments.

UMass captures fifth straight A–10 banner

Sortino and company come through not losing a game in run

By Matt Frascella
Collegian Staff

Excellence is a quality that every athletic team strives to achieve. For the past 14 seasons the Massachusetts softball team has advanced to the conference championship. That type of success is characteristic of the UMass softball program.

The Minutewomen team demonstrated to the nation again this weekend why they are the best team in the northeast region by winning the 1999 Atlantic 10 conference championship.

The No. 16 Massachusetts softball (41–8) won an unmatched fifth straight Atlantic–10 conference championship this past weekend in Salem, Va., winning all three games of the tournament and improving their conference record to 16–1.

UMass was once again powered by senior All–American Danielle Henderson who won all three games for the Minutewomen, while surrendering only one run in 21 innings. The squad beat Dayton 6–1 on Friday, blanked St. Joseph's 5–0 on Saturday before, knocking out Virginia Tech 2–0 yesterday.

The win solidified an automatic berth to the NCAA Regional Championships which are set to begin May 20. The conference championship also makes a strong case to the selection committee that the Minutewomen should host the regional.

Henderson, the 1999 A–10 pitcher of the year, pitched a one–hitter for UMass in game one Friday against the Dayton Flyers. The senior who last week was named the national player of the week struck out 17 batters to power the team and break her own record for strikeouts in a conference tournament game.

Senior Mandy Galas went 2–3 on the day. The 1999 A–10 player of the year knocked in two runs to lead the team past the Flyers. UMass also capitalized on Dayton errors to notch the win.

Henderson's lone earned run of the tournament came off a solo homerun by Dayton's Kerry White in the fourth inning of the game.

Game two was equally as lopsided for the Minutewomen. UMass blasted St. Joseph's for 5 runs to avenge their only A–10 loss of the year and advance to the conference championship game.

Henderson moved into second place all time in NCAA history for K's by striking out another 14 batters in the victory.

Freshman Jacquie Scarlett went 2–4 while knocking in two of UMass' five runs. Third baseman Annie Smith went 3–4 and also knocked in a run, as the heart of the order produced the majority of the Minutewomen's runs against St. Joseph's.

The final match yesterday pitted the two top A–10 teams against each other in a rematch of last week's doubleheader. The Minutewomen swept last week's action against Virginia Tech at home behind two dominating performances by Henderson.

The Commack, N.Y. native returned to the mound yesterday in the Hokies' backyard with the conference championship on the line. Henderson shut down the Hokies once again. She struck out 15 while giving up only two hits and one walk.

The only runs of the game came in the fourth inning off of the bat of Mandy Galas. The second baseman singled home plnch runner Ashley Bakken and senior speedster Katie Kenderski in the fourth inning to give UMass a 2–0 lead.

Two runs proved to be all the run support that Henderson needed to beat the Hokies for the third time this year. On the tournament she went 3–0 with 40 strikeouts. She was named the Championship's Most Outstanding Player for her outstanding weekend. Henderson gave up only two runs all season against A–10 opponents in a dominating senior campaign.

Henderson was joined on the 1999 All–Championship team by teammates Nikki Faeisler, Mandy Galas, Kiley Scofield, and junior Annie Smith. The Minutewomen had more players named to that team than any other school in the conference.

The win against Virginia Tech was Henderson's 25th straight win and the 21st in a row for the Minutewomen who enter the NCAA tournament riding the hottest win streak in the country.

Henderson is breaking records with every game that she pitches. She is so dominant within the conference that she was the only pitcher even nominated by A–10 coaches as the pitcher of the year. The distinction is her third in a row. No other pitcher has won that award three times.

Freshman Teri Rooney joined senior teammates Henderson and Galas on the All–Conference team for her work in the outfield this season. Rooney was edged out by Ashlee Dobbe of Virginia Tech for rookie of the year honors.

The Minutewomen now have almost two weeks to practice and recover before their season resumes with the beginning of the NCAA tournament. UMass is looking for its third straight trip to the College World Series.

UM baseball drops three to Bonnies

By Michael Kobylanski
Collegian Staff

Two weeks ago the Massachusetts baseball team was on top of the world. The Minutemen had just come off a three– game sweep of Atlantic 10 Eastern Division rival Fordham, and had opened up a six–game lead in the division while posting a 21–12 record.

Now, 14 days later, UMass is clutching for dear life. Losers of nine in a row, the Minutemen continued their downward spiral over the weekend at Earl Lorden Field, dropping a three–game set to St. Bonaventure.

By virtue of the defeats, the Bonnies moved into first– place in the A–10 East. The two teams have identical 10–8 conference records, but the boys from Olean, N.Y. have the tiebreaker advantage thanks to this weekend's sweep.

After losing both games of a doubleheader on Saturday, the Minutemen were three outs away from salvaging at least one game yesterday afternoon. However, a four–run nine inning rally by St. Bonaventure turned a 5–4 UMass lead into an 8–5 Bonnies win.

Sophomore left–hander Craig Szado had been pitching solidly up to the top of the ninth. After allowing three runs in the fourth that tied the game at 4–4, Szado settled down and got out of a clutch jam in the top of the eighth.

The ninth inning, however, belonged to St. Bonaventure. Senior catcher Eric Hemphill blasted a towering solo homer over the trees in left–center field to open the inning, tying the game at 5–5. Tim Burris followed that up with a double, his fourth hit of the day, to put the go–ahead run on base.

Outfielder Justin Roman then completed the comeback with another long ball, a two–run shot that just cleared the fence in left–center, but still gave the Bonnies a two–run lead. Mark Evers tacked on an RBI double later in the inning to make it an 8–5 final.

UMass (22–21, 10–8 in the Atlantic 10) jumped out early and scored three times in the top of the first inning, highlighted by Aaron Braunstein's 12th homerun of the season. An RBI single by Bryan Mazzaferro the following inning pushed the UMass lead to 4–1, but the Bonnies struck for three runs in the fourth inning to knot the game at 4–4.

Mazzaferro would then tack on a sacrifice fly in the next UMass at–bat to put his team ahead once again at 5–4, but that would only set the stage for the final St. Bonaventure rally.

Freshman shortstop Aaron Senez led the offensive attack for the Minutemen by going 3–for–4 with two runs scored.

Senior left–hander Bill Cooke made his second bid to break the school record for wins in a career, but once again fell short in game one on Saturday. St. Bonaventure broke open a 5–4 game in the top of seventh inning by scoring eight times en route to a 13–4 win.

Game two was more of the same for the Minutemen. Although this one was a nip–and–tuck affair, the Bonnies scored twice in the seventh inning to ensure a 7–4 win.

Braunstein, Gavin Clark, Mazzaferro and Chris Morgan all had three hits apiece on the day to lead the Minutemen.

The Minutemen will now be fighting for their playoff lives on Thursday and Friday when they travel to Philadelphia to face St. Joseph's. The two teams were supposed to play next Saturday and Sunday, but the series was pushed ahead to accommodate both schools. UMass starts final exams next weekend, while St. Joe's is holding graduation ceremonies.

Although UMass is currently holding the second spot in the division (the top two teams in each division make the A– 10 tournament), Rhode Island and Temple are also in the hunt for one of those two final spots.

Additionally, the Minutemen can also reclaim the No. 1 seed with a solid series. UMass must finish at least one game up on St. Bonaventure, because the Minutemen will lose the tiebreaker with the Bonnies.

Minutemen Notes: Yesterday's game marked the final home game for the five UMass seniors: Cooke, Mazzaferro, Brian Samela, Seth Kaplan and Braunstein... Cooke is expected to get one final crack at the career wins record in the SIU series. He is currently tied with Jason Bennett with 25 wins.

Coach McClellan expecting

COURTESY MEDIA RELATIONS
Francesca McClellan coached her team to a 9–6 record and a conference tournament appearance while dealing with the day–to–day tribulations of being pregnant.

By Seth Koenig
Collegian Staff

The clock strikes three in the morning and FrancesMca McClellan is awake. Twelve hours earlier, the team that she coaches, the Massachusetts women's lacrosse team, was preparing for competition on the greens of Ruth J. Totman Field — before a loss.

McClellan can't sleep. If only this player had done that, or such a call been made at such a time, maybe the outcome would have been different. If she's "lucky," as the coach says, "I'll get an hour of sleep before [my infant daughter] Elizabeth wakes up."

Tick–tock, tick–tock. tick–tock...

The alarm sounds in the form of Elizabeth crawling out of bed or whimpering for assistance. Time to be a mother.

Breakfast. Washing up.

McClellan takes care of all of the things she must take care of before she leaves to go to work. Time to be a coach.

"My own personal ups and downs I try to keep personal so that they don't effect the team," McClellan said. "The hardest thing, now that I'm not as stressed, was the stress level I brought home, and how little sleep I got."

But there's more to this story. So much more.

As McClellan strolls into her office in the Boyden Building at the University of Massachusetts, she is carrying much more than the goals and hopes of a Division 1 athletics squad and the responsibility of raising a small child. She's carrying the most precious thing of all: life.

Francesca McClellan is in the final month of her second pregnancy.

"I think that what the team saw with my condition was a little more crabbiness, and they handled that very well," McClellan said. "Personally, the energy level ends up suffering, but we did alright. I just couldn't be as mobile in demonstrations."

Demonstrations?

"My freshman year she was pregnant also... In practice, she jumps in with us and plays with us," senior co–captain Melissa Anderson. "I remember during our freshman year, she jumped in and rocked us — when she was pregnant and we were all in our prime. It kind of shows you how good she really is."

Mother. Coach. Now an all–pro player.

Any woman who has been pregnant before will now stop reading this article because she thinks this is all a lie.

There's no way this coach can so much as stand up quickly, much less score regularly on a bunch of student athletes at UMass.

"Maybe it's sort of role–modelish, to be cliche," McClellan said. "It shows that you can be working and productive, while dealing with family priorities."

"Maybe me coming out everyday with a 45–pound belly helped the kids come back everyday and work hard."

Said junior midfielder Noelle Gorski: "Personally, and I know a lot of other people on the team [feel this way] also, I'm going to want to have a family and a career when I get older. And we want to [be as successful as Francesca] also.

I think it's great that she's pregnant. She's managed to keep both her family life and her job."

Off the field, the Minutewomen have faced more adversity this year than any other in recent memory. Injuries to key players and family tragedies have haunted the team's schedule, leaving McClellan in the role of emotional supporter as well.

According to her players, her current pregnancy might even enhance her ability to deal with such issues.

"I notice sometimes she gets a little more motherly," Anderson said. "She nurtures us a lot more when she is pregnant. It's like we're all her kids — if we get hurt she gets worried, or if we get upset she gets worried."

Added junior defender Melissa Miele: "She reminds me a lot of my mom, which is weird. Just in the way they are, which is very outspoken."

Finally, enough evidence has been collected so that it is safe to say that

Students protest embassy bombing

Voices rise against war in former Yugoslavia

By Jake Lilien
Collegian Staff

Over 100 students marched across campus yesterday, to protest both the war in Yugoslavia and NATO's recent bombing of the Chinese Embassy in Belgrade.

"NATO — Nazis! CNN — liars!" screamed the protestors.

The students were organized by Amherst Against the War, a local organization dedicated to ending NATO's bombing of the former Yugoslavia.

The overwhelming majority of the students were Chinese, and were marching in opposition to the May 7 Embassy bombing in which four people were killed. They refuted NATO's claims that the bombing was accidental, saying that the demolition of the Embassy was an orchestrated attack.

"China is strongly against the war," said graduate student Xiao Yng. "That's why I think NATO's angry at China, and that's why I think they bombed the Embassy."

"It's a great violation of international law," she continued. "Even in war, you can not bomb an embassy!"

The protestors began and ended their rally on the steps of the Student Union, marching along North Pleasant Street shouting, "What do we want? Peace! When do we want it? Now!"

At one point in the rally, the protestors stopped at Memorial Hall, where Amherst Against the War member Jonathon Neale, who helped organize the protest, expressed opposition to the American military's interference in Yugoslavia.

"We don't want American soldiers to become involved in the war," he stated.

According to Neale, members of Amherst Against the War have a variety of different views, but are united in their opposition to the NATO bombings.

"We [also] agree that NATO should not be sending in ground troops, and that the refugees should be able to go wherever they want," he said.

Neale explained that, while the rally was organized before the bombing of the Chinese Embassy, the students' opposition to the bombing became one of the biggest issues of the protest.

"Chinese students are outraged by what happened," he said.

In addition to condemning the Embassy bombing, the students were angered by the insistence of many American media outlets that the bombings were accidental.

"It's all bull," said John Schmitt, a junior political science major. "I'm absolutely positive that it was a deliberate attack. It's no accident that this was an Asian embassy."

Tao Yu, a graduate student, agreed. "They did it on purpose, and CNN lied about it," he said.

Thursday service planned in Sopracasa's memory

A memorial service will be held Thursday for University of Massachusetts lacrosse player Eric Sopracasa, who died last Wednesday, May 5, after being struck in the chest by a lacrosse ball during team practice.

The service will take place at 3 p.m. at the Newman Center.

Sopracasa, 21, was a junior apparel marketing major from Farmingville, N.Y.

A funeral service was held yesterday in St. Margaret's of Scotland Church, Selden, N.Y.

According to Jo–anne Vanin, associate vice chancellor for student affairs and dean of students, Sopracasa collapsed after being hit by the ball, and stopped breathing.

He was revived briefly and taken to Cooley Dickinson Hospital where he was later pronounced dead.

Chaplains and counselors are available for support for all members of the campus community, and can be reached through the Dean of Students Office at 545–2684.

Alternate plan adopted for town parking garage

By Jill Carroll
Collegian Staff

AMHERST — Town Meeting gave a red light to increasing parking garage funding last night and to adopting an alternate garage plan, voting down both articles.

The Parking Garage Building Committee will not be receiving the extra $300,000 it requested and will have to make a decision in coming months: reinforce the deck of the garage or have more parking spaces. The garage was mandated by Town Meeting a year ago to cost $4 million.

"We'll have to get together as a committee and see," said Committee Co–Chairperson Elisa Campbell of what the group would do in order to meet the $4 million budget.

But Committee member Peter Kitchell, who recently broke with the unanimous decision of the Committee and brought an alternative garage plan before Town Meeting, said the Committee would be "nuts if they don't," choose to reinforce the deck instead of adding spaces.

Reinforcing the deck will make it possible to have more spaces underground and enable large vehicles, such as emergency vehicles and snow plows, to drive on the surface of the two–level garage. The garage, with around 200 spaces, will have one surface level and one underground level on Boltwood Walk behind Bueno Y Sano and Antonio's.

The Committee had debated for months whether to ask Town Meeting for additional money. That debate continued in the Amherst–Pelham Regional Middle School auditorium.

"A cheaper thing that doesn't give you the usage and [wear] of an expensive [thing] is not a bargain... you do not economize on things you only do once," said Zina Tillona, a Meeting member in favor of the extra funding.

But Meeting members wondered how the garage would be paid for.

Meeting member Seymour Friedman compared the spreadsheet showing taxpayers would not pay for the garage, to an assignment he had to use a spreadsheet to convince an Eskimo in winter, without electricity, to buy a refrigerator.

Town Manager Barry Del Castillho said people were misunderstanding the occupancy rate in the spreadsheet. With only the new spaces in the garage filled 60 percent of the time the garage would, over time, pay for itself.

Some were concerned that if the extra money was not passed, the Committee would be forced to decide not to use all the underground spaces.

"It's now or never," Campbell said of putting in additional underground spaces. "If we don't [put them in] when we build it we can't do it later."

Turning to the other debate of the night, Kitchell presented his article for an alternative garage design. The alternative plan came despite the Committee voting unanimously for a different design in March, which included Kitchell's vote.

His plan, placed a plaza in the middle of the garage rather than on one side as the approved plan had.

The original plan means "we will be stuck with a [garage design] with a ton of cars and asphalt," said Barry O'Connell an Amherst resident speaking against the Committee's plan. He said Kitchell's design offers an area that will encourage business around the garage to improve their back facades and a roadway that is easier to navigate.

But Select Board member Hill Boss disagreed saying a "people plaza should not be in the center... surrounded by moving vehicles."

Some Meeting members said the design came at too late an hour without enough consideration and there was no proof the it would meet the $4 million budget.

Kitchell said his garage plan was in essence the same, except for the plaza, and would fit the budget.

Smith College joins fight against sweatshops

By Andrea Crane
Collegian Correspondent

Students on more than 50 campuses across the nation have become furious after discovering that their colleges receive sportswear from factories overseas where employees work diligently in sweatshop conditions. One of these campuses, Smith College, has decided to do something about it.

Along with 16 other colleges and universities within the United States, Smith has recently become affiliated with the non–profit organization, the Fair Labor Association. By joining the FLA, Smith and other schools are adopting the organization's policies to ensure that products bearing the schools' names and logos are not being produced in sweatshops.

The colleges and universities hope to take a national approach to this issue and will require the companies that make their products to comply with FLA standards.

Over the past four months this issue has sparked much interest, and students are taking part in a variety of protests and sit–ins.

According to Jodie Morse in her article featured in the April 12, 1999 issue of Time Magazine, "Backed by unions and human–right groups, students on campuses from Harvard to Holy Cross are circulating petitions, picketing college bookstores and launching websites calling for 'sweat–free' clothing."

The Fair Labor Association has adopted a code of conduct and monitoring process, however, some students at Smith would like to take an independent approach to this problem.

Elizabeth Kennedy, a member of the newly formed Student Labor Coalition at Smith, opposes the school's affiliation with the FLA. Kennedy feels that "there are many things that the FLA is lacking."

China breaks ties & contact with America

By John Leicester
Associated Press

BEIJING — China broke off military ties and other contacts with the United States yesterday and demanded those responsible for NATO's bombing of its embassy in Yugoslavia be "severely" punished. Thousands of protesters hurled rocks at the U.S. Embassy in Beijing for a third day, with some dragging and kicking a life-size effigy of a U.S. soldier with an American flag on his chest.

Chinese authorities allowed waves of protesters to descend on the paint–spattered, debris–strewn U.S. Embassy from mid–morning yesterday until early today. Some hurled burning objects, and Tibetan monks in blood–red robes also joined the demonstrations. Police allowed protesters along a seven–block route that snaked between the U.S. and British embassies and shooed away onlookers.

China's suspension of high–level military ties — and talks over arms control, international security and human rights — signaled one of the lowest ebbs for Chinese–U.S. relations in 20 years. China's Foreign Ministry didn't say when contacts might resume. Foreign Minister Tang Jiaxuan condemned NATO's attack as a "vicious invasion" and demanded an "open and official" apology. He said the United States must thoroughly investigate Friday's attack, make the results public and "severely punish those responsible."

Secretary of State Madeleine Albright said NATO would provide China with a full explanation. She added that statements by Chinese authorities indicated anti–American protests in Beijing had the government's approval.

Hunkered down inside the embassy compound was U.S. Ambassador James Sasser, who refused Tang's summons for a face–to–face meeting. In an interview, Sasser said the protests got so threat–

Mother's Day crash kills 22

By Alan Clendenning
Associated Press

NEW ORLEANS — There were 43 of them, mostly elderly women from swampy small towns west of New Orleans, and they were making another of their occasional getaways to a Mississippi casino. Few ever won any money, but they liked to get out for a while, to socialize and play bingo during the 1 1/2–hour bus ride.

On Sunday — Mother's Day — their chartered bus picked them up in a supermarket parking lot. A half–hour later, just as the bingo cards were being passed out, the bus suddenly lurched. It careened off Interstate 610, crashed through a guardrail and nose–dived into an embankment.

"It veered to one side and they all hollered, 'It's going to crash!'" said George Tassin, whose wife and grown daughter were on the bus.

The crash killed 22 people; 15 people were still hospitalized last night.

A dozen federal investigators were at the scene yesterday. The bus driver and a witness said a car cut the bus off right before the crash, but the investigators said they probably would not determine the cause for months.

Most of the victims were in their 70's and 80's. Two were over 90. Juanita Marse, 73, and her husband, Arto, 74, made the casino trip about once a month from a small town called Reserve, said Nancy Desselle, their daughter. They hardly ever won more than $10, but they loved getting together with other elderly people.

"They would play games on the bus," Desselle said. "Sometimes it was the same crowd, sometimes it was new people." Some friends and relatives of the victims gathered at a hastily arranged memorial service in the Place Dubourg retirement home in LaPlace, a town of 29,000 about 25 miles west of New Orleans. Eight residents from the home were killed on the bus.

Among the injured was Barbara Gibson, 62, who had moved into

The Student Labor Coalition is a group composed of about 30 students who feel that they should adopt their own code of conduct.

The colleges and universities are allowed only one student representative on the FLA board and the group feels that they would not have adequate representation. "The voice of the students would not be heard," Kennedy said. Through research, Kennedy has discovered that products are still being made in factories that lack any real wage provisions. Workers are still getting paid much less than the minimum wage in many cases.

The SLC is still researching the living wage standard in countries around the world and they hope to establish an independent monitoring system.

Upon the request of the President of Smith College, Ruth Simmons, another committee has recently formed on campus to determine if the school should continue its affiliation with the FLA or adopt their own code of conduct. Stacy Caulk, the Smith student government association vice president, is one of the six members of this committee which is composed of students, faculty and administration.

After many meetings and a lot of consideration, it has been decided that, beginning next semester, rallies and protest will take place to push for Smith's withdrawal from the FLA.

With strong support and approval from Simmons, a sample code of conduct has been drafted and will be presented before the Board of Trustees next semester.

The main points outlined in the draft include two provisions that the FLA code lacked: (1) full public disclosure of the names and locations of the factories where their licensed products are made, (2) assurance that workers are provided real living wages.

Also included in the new code of conduct is the protection of women's rights and the ending of forced contraception. Another main section of the draft is an environmental clause, assuring that companies will be monitored for heeding to the laws protecting the environment.

"The sample code of conduct looks really good," Kennedy said, "I think that we will receive a lot of support for it."

The final decision about Smith's policy on this issue of sweatshop labor will not be made until next semester.

Town shelters open hearts and pantries

Amherst shelter gets while it gives

Joan Logan volunteers at the Not Bread Alone soup kitchen in the First Congregational Church of Amherst.

The Amherst Survival Center is not your traditional shelter. Though it serves a free lunch four days a week and has a free store and food pantry like other shelters, Assistant Director and Volunteer Coordinator Mike Cavatorta said that what makes this center so different from others is that there is often no distinction between who's helping whom.

Cavatorta said that the shelter is "more about meeting people where they're at then trying to fix them."

"Many of the volunteers use the services, while those who come in to use the service volunteer in some way," said Cavatorta. "They don't feel okay about taking and not giving back."

Cavatorta also said that the volunteers are mainly people with disabilities, people with low income who use their services and those looking for an opportunity to socialize and hang out. "It's like a big self-help center," he said.

The shelter serves lunch Monday through Thursday on a walk-in basis. Cavatorta said the shelter receives donations of day-old bread and pastries from local area stores, as well as clothes and household items.

However, Cavatorta said the summer is always the hardest time for donations because donators go away for the summer and kids are home from school.

Cavatorta pointed out the discrepancies of social class in the Valley saying, "In the valley, there are a lot of rich and poor living in the same area." Cavatorta said that while are landfills are running out of space because of the surplus of stuff people have and no longer need, others who are poor do not have enough. "It's a myth of scarcity."

The donated materials processed by volunteers at the Center every year was estimated by Cavatorta to be about 500,000 pounds, of which 300,000 are given away. The rest goes to the Salvation Army.

The nucleus of the Center, the workers and volunteers, put in quite a bit of time to keep things running smoothly. Cavatorta said it takes about 1,500 hours of volunteering time to run the Center and 600 hours of staff time. "The work here is not glamorous. The impact is really concrete, but in smaller increments."

Aside from staff workers at the Center, Cavatora pays most of his credit to volunteers. "Volunteers are really what make the place work," he said.

Local church serves up more than food

By Mark Ramirez
Collegian Correspondent

Although Huei-Ling Greeney gets paid for running the local soup kitchen, Not Bread Alone, her job satisfaction comes from those who don't get paid.

Not Bread Alone, open only on weekends, is held in the basement of the First Congregational Church of Amherst on Boltwood Avenue.

"The best part about this job is working with volunteers," said Huei-Ling Greeney, adding that "they make such a big difference in people's lives without even knowing it."

Greeney, 41, is a University of Massachusetts graduate economics student and the only salaried employee of Not Bread Alone. She took the job in 1996, cooking and serving food to whoever comes in. "We ask no questions," she said, "anybody is welcome."

This soup kitchen serves more than soup. Not Bread Alone is open from 10:30 a.m. to 2 p.m. every Saturday and Sunday, serving breakfast and lunch. On a typical day, one might sit down to a meal of bread, salad, stir-fried vegetables, tuna casserole and a large choice of desserts. According to Greeney, Not Bread Alone cooks and serves 5,000 meals and gives away 3,000 bags of groceries annually, on a budget of $25,000 supplemented by donations from local supermarkets. She says her study in economics has made her very conscientious about spending resources. Other aspects of her job are fundraising and recruiting volunteers.

Not Bread Alone has between 15–20 volunteers every weekend, and serves between 40–60 guests per day. Greeney estimates that 70 percent of all volunteers are from local churches, with the rest coming from area schools, such as UMass, and youth groups, such as the Girl Scouts.

The guests are as varied as the volunteers. Most come from Amherst, some are from Belchertown and Northampton, while a few are from Holyoke and Springfield. There are senior citizens, single people, parents and families.

Nelson Holden, a senior citizen and long-time resident of Amherst, has been coming to Not Bread Alone every weekend for a year.

"I come for the people; everyone is nice here," he said. "I like to socialize, instead of sitting in my apartment." Holden heard of the kitchen at Amherst's Senior Center at the Bangs Community Center. "Good things travel fast," added Greeney.

Not Bread Alone was founded as The Soup Company in 1989, under the management of the First Congregational Church. The Center for Human Development, a Springfield agency which supports 20–30 similar programs, took over in 1992 and gave the kitchen its current name.

Greeney has lived in Amherst for the past five years. "I wouldn't say it's hard work; it's not hard because it suits my personality." She says that a family of four children, as well as running a home-stay program for college students while in Tennessee, prepared her for this job, cooking large amounts of food quickly. She would like to stay on as long as she can, she said, because "it's a place to have some impact."

"I love to cook," she says, "and I love people."

ening at one point that he ordered preparations for destroying sensitive documents.

Tens of thousands of protesters, spurred on by the government, have marched in 20 cities nationwide in the past three days in the biggest protests since the Tiananmen Square pro-democracy demonstrations in Beijing 10 years ago.

Protesters' emotions were inflamed by government-run media reports that the attack on the Chinese embassy that killed three journalists was deliberate.

"How could you be that shameless? Get out of China, American butchers!" read a slogan spray-painted by protesters on a sheet-metal fence facing the battered U.S. Embassy.

President Clinton apologized anew yesterday for the bombing, calling it "an isolated tragic mistake." U.S. officials blamed it on misinformation from CIA target planners.

"I apologize. I regret this," Clinton said.

China's suspension of contacts with the United States represented a blow for Clinton's foreign policy. His administration has repeatedly cited talks over human rights, arms control and other issues as proof that their policy of engaging China was bearing fruit.

The suspended meetings cover concerns that China has provided nuclear weapons or missile technology to Pakistan, Iran and other countries and comes at a time of controversy over Chinese espionage in the United States.

The measures were similar to ones China took but never publicly announced in a confrontation with Washington over Taiwan in 1995. China called off a visit by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and downgraded but did not cancel a visit tomorrow by German Chancellor Gerhard Schroeder.

Place Dubourg only a month ago and was looking forward to taking a trip with the gambling group.

"She was just getting to know the people in the apartment complex," said her niece Donna Busby. "She was so excited about it, and couldn't wait to go."

Both of Gibson's legs and arms were broken, her pelvis and right ankle were crushed, and her face was cut all over. "But she's going to make it," said her daughter, Brenda Samrow.

The bus driver, Frank Bedell, and at least one witness said the bus went out of control after a compact car cut it off on a stretch of highway that passes through the largest park in New Orleans. Robert Francis, vice chairman of the National Transportation Safety Board, said the NTSB would interview witnesses, examine the bus for possible mechanical problems and look into Bedell's medical history.

Bedell, who suffered a fractured pelvis and was undergoing surgery yesterday, drove a municipal bus in New Orleans for 17 years before taking a job with Custom Bus Charters about three years ago, said his mother, Evelyn Bedell.

Place Dubourg resident Isabel Dutreix recalled how one of the victims, her friend Dorothy Richard, 74, used to bring her pudding and a newspaper every day.

Dutreix doesn't go on casino trips, but she and Richard often played bingo together and would talk about splitting their jackpots if either won. Dutreix couldn't wait to see Richard on Sunday because she had such good news. She had won at bingo on Friday night.

Reporter tells all

Now that I'm graduating and won't be reporting for the Collegian anymore, I can finally tell all the crap that has been going on that I couldn't report about before. After a year covering government, SGA and Amherst, there are lots of scandals, as well as unsung heros, to reveal.

But first I've got to say one thing to a group of people and you know who you are, especially you, tubby, who have tried for the last year to get me kicked out of UMass, sue me, sue the Collegian and try to stop me from getting a job, all because I was doing my job as a reporter a year ago. So all I gotta say is na, na, na, na, na, naaaaa! I am graduating, on time, with good grades and I have a great job as a reporter waiting for me and there's not a damn thing you can do about it. And if I ever catch you trying to screw around with me again, I'll nail your asses to the wall.

By the way numbnuts, I'm not the news editor.

On to the interesting stuff. People were getting drunk at the SGA meetings last year and causing such a ruckus the speaker had to make an announcement telling them to stop. But in all fairness you have to either be drunk, or a Collegian SGA reporter, to make it through those three hours of torture every Wednesday night.

I was writing an article last spring about some people. As I was alone in the newsroom writing it around 11 p.m. they came down and surrounded me and started yelling. One ended up getting thrown out of the Collegian after the night editor came in and rescued me from the maniacs. Then they called the editor-in-chief's house the next morning six times around 6 a.m. But he wasn't there and his roommates were pissed. The same morning they came down to the Collegian and told the distribution manager that he couldn't send out the paper. He told them it was already out in trucks being delivered so the little freaks ran around campus and took the paper out of every location except for the Campus Center, where they took about half of them. It is amazing the shit you put up with being a Collegian reporter.

NEWS FLASH TO THOSE PSYCHOS: You wasted your energy. People never read my articles then anyway because I was covering the most boring beat on campus.

From what I can tell with the admissions policy, the University scrambled and wiped out the use of race completely, but they didn't actually write a new policy. They didn't have a policy whatsoever for weeks — that is why they were so confused and closed in the beginning about what the new policy was. That is also why no one was consulted about the policy change, because it happened probably the same day the Boston Latin decision happened. The people doing the admitting didn't even know what was going on for weeks.

I've run across so many people who hate the students and purposely try to screw them but there are a few who actually give a damn like journalism professor Karen List, the greatest professor ever to walk the face of the Earth. I would cry for a week if she left UMass. And the great journalism department for having our backs when we were under attack. You all are my heros and I'm determined to do you proud.

Ric Townes, assistant vice-chancellor for campus activities. The man is actually doing his job. He cares about the students and even more miraculously on this campus, is open about it. He's been harassed and threatened because of it.

John Bracey, professor in the Afro-American studies— the guy is amazing and not afraid of anybody, especially Chancellor Scott. Marc Kenen, director of SCERA — even though he was suspicious of me, he does a lot for students.

As far as students go, Kiya Stokes, a graduate student and a main leader of the student protesters, was a hero this spring. He put a brain behind the chants and in front of the marches. Ricardo Rodriguez, a member of Gamma Phi Sigma–Latin fraternity Delta chapter, Hermanos Unidos...had raised money for single students-moms, said this in the April 26 Collegian, "Women are still the heart and souls of this earth because of their endless dedication to children." Attention all you boys out there, this is a real man.

These will be missed

My friend and fellow graduating senior Allison said to me the other day, "I feel good about my college career. I have no regrets." That's a good attitude to have. Well, Kristen and everyone else that is graduating, this is the last chance, the last dance for love. No — not for love, before it is all over. That's right — no more jazz class, no more spy missions, hopefully no more hammering my car to make it start.

Things are going to change. Will we miss this or will we be happy to be moving on? Well, I already know the things I will not miss, starting with the Bursars office. I will be glad when I never have to deal with them again. I also will not miss the lines to get into the bars uptown, the speed bumps in the Valley, having no money. Oh, I suppose this means I won't be missing class anymore either. I basically won't miss anything that has been wretch.

Danielle Fuguzy

What will I miss? I guess this list could be endless. I will miss Jep with the MVA's, ahrex like the College, a certain roommate that can be distracting when she streaks, another roommate that takes it upon herself to point out that certain men are too fine to be walking alone, poop in the Campus Center Hotel, grilled cheese in the middle of the night, stuffed animals because I have real love for them, analyzing every single thing that happens when my roommates and I are not watching TV but rather enjoying each other's company.

You know what else I am really going to miss? Really long Student Government Association on Wednesday nights. I am not harpy I won't be seeing Claire or the Lizza as much. I'll miss the Walkie Talkies and Big Mama Bloody Toes. I will never be able to have my room decor; the hotel quite the same. I will miss the boys at Fearing Street and all the dance parties we had. I know Cliff Claven isn't coming to New York with me so therefore I will miss her. My Ya- Ya. Italy. I know Ellen will miss her fiancee B. My new place will not have the little straw houses that D.J.'s mom sent us, the one that Ashni grew so fond of over the years.

I heard Amy gave them to her but the picture is coming with me. I will miss the good ole coasters that were very dainty. Newms. I will miss Erin's sleeping, studying, and school habits. Uno when my brother plays, I will miss my boy from Liquid! Man he was hot!! I will miss the countless numbers of walk of shames. Ellen thank god we don't live next to Doris anymore because who only knows what she would think of you now. I will miss that night at McMurphy's when we entertained everyone with our music. Our band is now going to have to break up, but each of us can keep a pair of sunglasses and hopefully everyone will keep on singing Respect. Last I will miss giving out the out the Shining Star Award — who gonna win it this week?

All in all its been a great time. I'll miss things as I have mentioned but we're all on to bigger and better things. What they are I am not sure, but I know they will be good, at least I hope so. I am a housekeeper, or better yet a detective. I can find anything my roommate Ellen can lose (believe me she loses everything, between her keys and her sunglasses forget I am forever looking for her things!! It can be really annoying, and yet I will miss it and so will she!)

Thank you to everyone who made these four years great. Mom and Dad the ransom definitely helped. Amanda Scoot Lou and Bri I am coming home like I have been in a war or something. What have I learned?? I don't know specifically but I know that I am wiser, and stronger because of my time here. In the whole scheme of life UMass did make a difference. Veni, Vidi, Vicit!

Danielle Fuguzy is the Collegian staff member with the best accent.

The last waltz

We kissed a shot of Kentucky straight/ I swore this life was worth the wait.
— law breaker

Some people call me the space cowboy. Some people call me the gangster of love.

Most people just call me Mike, though. I prefer "the gangster of love," but I didn't catch on like I had hoped. Not like "crapackers" did in high school. (Oh, high school kids can be so cruel.)

Mike Messaros

But soon it'll be "UMass graduate." Scary. I've come four years, and despite my best intentions I almost didn't make it.

After my first year I almost dropped out because of my grades. Actually, my parents almost dragged me out, kicking and screaming, because I wasn't doing any work. It wasn't even like I was partying or riding the chocolate pony, which would seem to be a whole lot more fun and romantic. Instead, I was just sitting in my room, reading book after book that wasn't on any syllabus and listening to my music. I begged my parents to let me go back — not because I loved UMass, but more for the shame of not being able to finish on my own terms. My parents asked me when I was going to decide to live up to my potential, to stop screwing off. For once I listened.

After sophomore year I almost dropped out again, this time by choice. I knew all I know now when I was younger — if I had a nickel for every time I thought that over the past few months. It wasn't until recently that I allowed myself to settle down, get my ya-yas out and live. And now that I've settled down and learned how to get my ya-yas out, it's time to move on.

And I have to leave now — right now — is just another way that life is unfair.

I'm not going to make this into a "how the Collegian can save your life" column, Well, OK — I am. it was only when I came to this paper and started writing that my life really came together. It's the people, it's the outlet, it's people telling you that they like what you wrote — suddenly things are alright.

Things started to come together. I figured out how to relax. I realized how fucking beautiful this town can be when it wants to be — whether its streets are lined with snow and its trees are draped with white Christmas lights or when people are out on the common on the first summer day. (P.S. A lot of the campus is still coyote ugly, though.) I found out how great a roomful of friends can be and how sweet it sounds when they are all laughing. I gained confidence. I kissed and danced and sang loudly in the shower (not all of that happened in the shower — just the singing and a whole lot of lather!). I'm still learning the ropes, but I'm getting there. But now I'm starting to sound like a cheesy poster, so I'll stop.

So I'll start this: I hate to get defensive, but for one paragraph, I will — the people who work down here work hard. There are so many reasons to read this paper, and there are so many reasons to celebrate it. A lot of groups want their opinions heard and everyone is given a fair shake, no matter how many times you people ask and moan (you know who you are. I've listened to you for a while and now it's my turn — shut up). In the end, this is the greatest paper. Ever. It will eternally be getting a whai-what.

These people, along with my parents, are perhaps the most important reason why I'm here today. I could be living in my parents' basement, ignoring their repeated banging on the floor while I listen to Night Ranger and page through the porno I stole from work. You know I couldn't make it through a whole article without mentioning porn — it's an addiction in and of itself just mentioning it.) But instead, I'm here writing this. I'd love to give shout outs to everyone down here who I'm going to miss, who's kicked my ass or who holds a special place in my heart, but I'm afraid I'll miss someone. But you know who you are.

So this is it. The long goodbye. Off to Boston (otherwise known as "Makeout City." I've been told), a good eight-hour trip from my birthplace and homeland of sunny Oreland, Pa. I'm unemployed, but living amongst friends. I plan to sit in the shade at Boston Common and do something I haven't had time to do as an English major — read some books. Then I'll worry about the fact that my savings are dwindling and I need a job. That'll take a week.

So to quote Vis Savage, drummer of Spinal Tap, "Have a good time... all the time." "Live your life full of joy and thunder," as R.E.M. says. Good advice.

Originally, I was going to be all smart-ass and say something along the lines of "So long, suckers." But sentiment has caught up to me and instead I just want to say thank you and good luck and goodbye. It's been nice.

Mike "James Shaker/Messy Mess/Scoop" Messaros used to be a Collegian columnist and will spend the summer working on his NHL 99 backhand and listening to a lot of rock 'n' roll.

Thank you for reading the Ed/Op page throughout the year!

Just havin' thoughts

Who Knew

Who knew there would come a day
When all we seem to do is cry

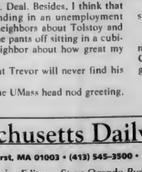
Who knew there would come a day
When all we ask is why?

Who knew it would be this hard
To think of something to say
But it seems
The only thing I can think of
Is everything will be okay

What do you do when someone close to you dies?
You hold on to them and never say goodbye

You ask who knew?
No one knows
The only thing I do know is that we have to live for today
For the honest truth is we never really know

After the rain, comes the sun
Our dear friend, Eric,
In our hearts you will never go UNSUNG



We'll always remember you SOUP!

—In memory of Eric Sopracasa

Na, na, na, na/ na, na, na, na, na/ hey, hey, hey/ goodbye! Actually, being a liberal arts major heading out into the workforce, I'm probably going to be dancing to the tune of "Another One Bites the Dust." But hey, at least I'll be dancing (on the coffee table).

I've been here for four years, and I still get lost in Machmer.

I have learned that when Jaimie and I establish a "reduction plan," it generally results in increase. But we try.

Elsa Allen

I have never seen the alleged piano in the FAC.

Liberal Arts majors will continuously complain about the fact that they can't get jobs. They will perpetually bitch about the job fairs.

That's how it goes, Deal. Besides, I think that the prospect of standing in an unemployment line, talking to my neighbors about Tolstoy and Shakespeare beats the pants off sitting in a cubicle talking to my neighbor about how great my dental plan is.

I have realized that Trevor will never find his keys.

I have perfected the UMass head nod greeting, and the corresponding "wassup." I credit this to living in Southwest.

I have perfected the avoidance techniques used when you see someone that thinks they're your best friend even though you just had one class with them and can't remember their name. I credit this, also, to living in Southwest.

I have learned that Southwest, in general, is not the nicest of places. I credit this to the fact that people pee in the elevators.

Shout-outs to all my peeps from the 15th floor of Kennedy, you know who you are.

Rich, Joe and Jenn... a moment of silence for Denise.

Kraft is lying when they say you need milk and butter for your mac and cheese. It's just not so.

Danielle, has anyone ever told you that you're out of control? I think you should apologize.

I have learned never to take my stepbrother, Eric to the grocery store. Period. He hits me in the ankles with the cart. Plus, he's still putting cats down his pants.

The Old Chapel will always be under construction.

Adam, when are you coming to P-town?

I will never think Neil Diamond is cool. No matter how many times I hear "Sweet Caroline" sung in chorus by groups of drunk girls.

I will never like John Denver. Sorry Jenn.

Props to the Persian Mafia (that's for you Jenn, sorry about the John Denver thing.)

Do you know that it's always ten degrees colder and windier on campus than it is at my house, a block and a half away. Thanks to W.E.B. DuBois and the most phallic channeler of wind in the nation.

Chetan will never vacuum my living room. The last time he touched a vacuum... well we all know what happened.

Josh and I are probably having a fight.

The library will always scare me, but my chances of seeing a brick fall before I leave here on May 23, are slim to none. Dawgammit!

I will probably never get a what what.

Joe, got any munkeys?

I like living with Fialkow, she falls asleep on the couch a lot, but she'll never tell you that in her columns. I think it's because she's watching infomercials.

Shout out to you, Mush-dogg.

Cristi gets a what what, so I've heard.

I think that whoever manufactures those little yellow envelopes that Parking services uses is making a whole heck of a lot of moolah.

Maybe I could get a job working for them after graduation.

Well, that's all she wrote. No, really, that's all I wrote, so stop reading. I mean it, stop. There's no more, quit it.

I'm out.

Peace.

Hillel director reflects on 25 years of Jewish campus

Rabbi Saul Perlmutter has served the past 25 years as the director of the University of Massachusetts Hillel. He will be leaving on a year-long sabbatical this fall. I posed a few questions for him regarding his impression of Jewish life on campus over the past 25 years. What follows are his answers.

How has your relationship with students changed over the last quarter century?

Quarter century, it sounds so old!

When I first got here, students would come to the Hillel office, which was then in Student Union 302, and ask for the rabbi. When I told them I was the rabbi, they would say, "Oh, you look so young. I imagined you'd be an old man with a beard!"

Of course, I was a lot younger then. I came to UMass, right out of rabbinical school, at the age of 25. A little quick math will tell you that I'm 50 now. And these days, students don't have much trouble identifying me as the rabbi, even though I don't have a beard.

Back then, I was more like an older brother to undergrads and a peer to graduate students. Now I think a lot of students look at me as a quasi-parent, since I am their parents' age. I don't feel particularly old, though. Being around students helps keep me feeling energetic.

Now that my own daughter is about to go off to college next fall, it helps me to understand my relationship with students in a new light. So much of what college is about is becoming independent, trying new things, gaining confidence, discovering one's self, building one's own friends and community.

I'd like to think that I have become less controlling and more respectful of students' taking charge of Jewish life on campus. These days, I would much rather help train a student to have the experience of leading a service, for example, than leading it myself. I really enjoy working with students, like the JRAPpers [Jewish Residential Area Programmers], helping them to be successful, rather than feeling that I am the one who has to do the programs.

How has Jewish life changed institutionally?

Back then, Hillel's office was a small room in the Student Union. The Hillel staff was me and a part-time secretary. There were seven or so involved students who were the key organizers of just about everything.

There was no Hillel House, no kosher meal plan, Judaic Studies course but no department, no Hillel community Board of Directors, no Jewish grad group, no Jewish faculty and staff group, no Chabad House, no Office of Jewish Affairs, no Jewish Affairs editor at the Collegian, no permanent home for the Jewish Community of Amherst, no Yiddish Book Center and no e-mail.

Today all these things are in place.

There may have been many good reasons for a student to come to UMass 25 years ago, but to find a vibrant, multi-faceted Jewish life was not one of them. Today, I meet students who apply to UMass because of the strong Jewish student community on campus. And many transfer students choose UMass because they see much more happening at Hillel here that at their previous school.

What about anti-Semitism on campus? How has that affected Jewish life and your work?

During much of the 1980s and the early 1990s, there were overt manifestations of anti-Semitism on campus, including certain writers at the Collegian, several speakers who came to UMass and even the way some faculty treated Jewish students who wanted to observe Jewish holidays. One pamphlet that circulated on campus, for example, was taken, almost word for word, from an American Nazi group. As you can imagine, many Jewish students felt uncomfortable at UMass.

Since part of Hillel's role is to both support and advocate for Jewish students, much of our time and energy was spent dealing with this issue. It was difficult because parts of the UMass administration then did not understand our concerns. Feeling attacked and under pressure, Jewish student leaders often had to function in a crisis atmosphere. Instead of being able to focus on the joyous, positive aspects of Jewish life, we had to deal with a lot of distress and ugliness.

Every time there was a major speaker known to say anti- Semitic remarks, media from all over called incessantly to find out what Hillel was going to do about it. One of the things I learned during this period was how much the media often contributes to an atmosphere of tension and confrontation.

There were also some terrific intergroup programs during that period, joint Chanukah-Kwanzaa celebrations, multi- cultural Passover seders, etc.

How did the situation turn around?

Jewish faculty and staff, Hillel and other groups and individuals eventually got the University leadership to understand that anti-Semitism was not just a Jewish problem, but it was a campus problem. The University, and not just the Jewish community, had a responsibility to address it.

Hillel and others worked with the University to establish a Chancellor's Council on Civility, which eventually led to the establishment of the Office of Human Relations. We helped inaugurate the University-sponsored Crossworlds series with an unforgettable evening with Elie Wiesel and Maya Angelou speaking before 6,000 people in the Mullins Center. Our students worked with the Collegian to initiate the Jewish Affairs editorship. And we helped the University establish the Chancellor's Task Force on Anti-Semitism and Jewish Awareness, which led to the creation of the Office of Jewish Affairs. All of these steps meant that the University was not only recognizing that there was a problem, but also that it, and not just Hillel, was responsible for improving the situation.

And, I'm pleased to say, things have greatly improved. We are now able to focus our energy on positive, celebratory, upbeat activities.

What are some of these upbeat activities?

For the past three years we have sent a UMass contingent of 20–30 students on a national student mission to Israel. The UMass group is one of the largest on the mission. I have traveled with the group twice, and loved it both times. We learn a lot and have a great time. We also form a strong connection with one another that continues to strengthen Jewish life as a whole on campus when we return.

Kolot, which means voices, is an awesome upbeat Jewish a capella group that has just taken off in the last four years. They've sung all across the state from Pittsfield to Boston, and they're about to make their first CD.

The Jewish Living Community, a Jewish student residence on the top floor of our Hillel House, has become a great place to live for students who are sophomores and up. Nearly two years ago the UMass Kosher Meal Plan moved into the Hillel House, which has benefitted both.

Friday nights at Hillel have really taken off. Services are student-led and spirited, and students often stay to sing well after dinner is over. The momentum has led to Saturday morning services which began to be held on a regular basis recently.

Just in the last year or two, we've started a monthly open- mic coffeehouse at Hillel, a Jewish environmental group, a storytelling group, and Kesher, a group for Reform students. And just this month, students are beginning to form a Jewish theatre group that will put on a major production next year.

This year, we also began a whole new experiment, called JRAPpers, which has been really great.

What are JRAPpers?

It stands for Jewish Residential Area Programmers. These are five students, funded by a grant from the Jewish Endowment Foundation of Western Massachusetts, who live in five different residential areas on campus. They plan programs with and for Jewish students in their areas, and help Jewish students get to know one another.

The JRAPper program is part of a new approach that we have been taking to Jewish campus work. While there are many students who readily become active in Hillel, there are others who don't. So we have started the JRAPpers and our Jewish Campus Service Corps [JCSC] Fellow to connect with Jewish students wherever they are.

These days, it's rare that anyone is in the same job after 25 years. How is it that you're still here and that you sound like you're still excited about what you're doing?

It's true that I'm still in the same job, but I've been able to do so many different things in this job that I still find myself challenged and growing. I've had to learn how to create new staff positions and integrate them into a team, to build a Board from scratch, to acquire and run a building and so on. My work keeps changing from year to year.

Also, working with students generates a lot of energy and keeps me on my toes.

Are there any accomplishments of which you are particularly proud?

This year, we won our fourth Haber Award. This is international Hillel's highest recognition for "programs of outstanding quality for the Jewish campus community." UMass Hillel is one of only three Hillels in the world to have won this "gold medal" of Hillel's awards four times.

But more important than any awards of this sort is the feeling of being part of so many people's lives. Even after graduating, many alumni still keep in touch and even come to visit. In December, for example, I did a wedding in New Jersey of a student who graduated in the 1970s. It's nice knowing that I have been important to students' lives, as they are important to me.

Program director to move

Hillel House program director David Arfa is leaving the position he has held for two years to pursue storytelling and Jewish environmental teaching.

Arfa has worked with students creating programs concentrating on topics from Israel to interfaith relations. He has also taught one-credit classes on Jewish storytelling and Jewish ecological values.

"This has been a really amazing job," Arfa said. "I got to help folks create what they wanted to create."

Arfa now has the chance to "market" both his storytelling and Jewish environmental teaching.

"I have the opportunity to see what I can do with this," Arfa said. "Part of what I want to do is just try."

Arfa called his job as program director "an incredible opportunity which is very rare." The job, which has allowed Arfa to "be a part of religious life" as well as to "support students in whatever they want to explore" is "going to be missed."

Arfa said that working with people was one of the positive aspects of his job.

"I got to do something that's important for people's lives," Arfa said.

He quoted author Joseph Cambell in explaining his decision to move on to something new.

"He said to 'follow what you love,'" Arfa said. "I love storytelling, Jewish stories particularly."

He has already begun to expand his storytelling beyond the University of Massachusetts campus, performing at the National Yiddish Book Center in Amherst.

Arfa, who lives in Shelburne Falls, will remain in the area.

Jewish way of life

Writing about my Judaism presents me with the challenge of trying to place, in words, the indescribable beauty and emotion which is the basis of my Jewish way of life.

All of my most powerful experiences are associated with my Jewish self. The people, places and experiences that have changed my life are all related to my being Jewish, although not necessarily religious. Judaism is not an "ism" to me, but a being, a self, an inextricable part of who I am. Judaism affects the way I eat, how I act and the choices I make.

I believe that every person acts, lives and breathes in order to create moments of connection, clarity and spirituality. All of humankind is acting and living because of those precious moments, waiting for them to reoccur. Those moments make life worthwhile. Being Jewish lends itself to many of these moments.

Hannah Braune

Judaism has brought me many moments of growth and spiritual experience. One of these moments occurs weekly. Every week there is a 24-hour period of possible moments, the Shabbat. Shabbat is a peri-oral time for me to escape my weekly self and experience something beyond. It is a time when connections to others and myself can be strengthened. It is a weekly opportunity for me to reevaluate myself and recall the larger picture of why I may be on this earth. I observe Shabbat by not using electricity, not doing homework and not writing. I spend the time with friends, praying, singing, eating and reading. When individuals consecrate such events, atmospheres and times can be made sacred. Shabbat is one of these sacred times.

Often on Shabbat I sing with others. Sometimes those songs are without words, only tunes, sounds. Sometimes those tunes turn into voices of feelings and when voices like that sing together, I often think I can "hear" G–d among them. It is voices united that remind me of why I am a practicing Jew.

I experienced powerful moments in Israel that have inspired me to remain Jewish. Some of those moments occurred in the desert at night. Judaism is more than food and holidays — it is a constant indescribable infiniteness. The desert helped me to realize the infiniteness of life. Other times, moments in Israel involved group experiences. During one such experience, I danced and sang with other Jews throughout Jerusalem out of pride for our Jewishness. Several times during my year-long stay, I sat with a friend in front of the Wailing Wall observing the hundreds of pilgrims who made their first or hundredth trip there.

A major part of my Jewishness is the treatment of fellow human beings. There is a kindness and compassion which exists in Judaism that has inevitably shaped my identity. It is an obligation to care for one's fellow human beings. It is that kindness and respect that increases my love for Judaism.

"Jewish" can be interpreted to mean so many different things for people. It is an extremely subjective idea, and due to that subjectivity, individuals can explore what touches them, what makes them want to be Jewish.

Passion is what renews my Jewishness; passion for those moments of clarity that my Jewishness has given me; passion for the kind of Israel, passion for Shabbat, passion for connection and peace with fellow human beings and passion for the potential of a better world. Mostly, these passions represent passion for those rare glimpses of the Divine. We are all part of the Divine, and my Jewishness has helped me realize that.

The meaning of G–d

I get many questions as to why I write the word G–d the way I do. I was always taught that G–d was an almighty, powerful being that should always be respected. When I was in Hebrew School, we were taught to write the word in this way. I was taught that if you wrote the word out fully and then erased it, you were erasing G–d from your life.

I always thought of G–d as an aura in life. I never really thought that G–d was a person or a thing. I feel that if G–d is anything, it is a feeling you have. It is the way you feel when you wake up in the morning, the feeling you get when you get an "A" on a paper, the feeling you get when you celebrate a joyous occasion. It is also the feeling you get when someone you care about passes away, the feeling you get when you flunk an exam or the feeling you get when your heart breaks. G–d is all your feelings and emotions. G–d is there all the time.

Jaclyn Sobel

When I was younger, there was this song we used to sing in Hebrew School. The words said something to the effect that G–d is here, G–d is there. G–d is everywhere. And as we sang the song, we would shake our hands in all directions to show that G–d is really everywhere. I learned and feel that G–d is with you at all times.

People always ask why things happen to them if they have done nothing wrong. In life, things just happen. I think that some things are G–d's doing, while others are people's doing. Then why, you ask, is it said that people were created in the image of G–d and G–d has nothing to do with what is happening? I will tell you my reasoning—humans need to be able to take responsibility for their own actions. It seems that no one knows how to claim a mistake or a fault.

As I sit here and write this, I can feel my "G–d" reading this over my shoulder. I say my "G–d" because I think that everyone has their own image of what they think G–d is. Mine just happens to be a feeling I have. I am writing what I feel in my heart, yet I feel torn.

When I hear people say that they do not believe in G–d, it upsets me a bit. (Just to be clear—what you believe is what you believe. I am not saying that it is wrong, I am just stating my opinion about it.) I think that G–d has been such a strong guiding factor in my life. I am not saying that all I do is affected by G–d, but I am saying that it helps me to believe. I am saying that I have faith.

Faith is a strong word. I am a believer. I use my image of G–d to put a positive spin on life. My thoughts of G–d keep me going. When someone is in trouble or I am feeling down, I think about life. I think about how I can go on. I use my faith and belief in G–d to help me get through it. I think to myself, as crazy as it may sound, "I am not that bad of a person, I have so much to live for, G–d will get me through this." I think this way, for example, when I am going to fly. I hate to fly. It really scares me. Last November, I was flying to Israel. It is about at 12–hour plane ride. Someone on the plane said to me, "We have gotten this far, G–d would not let us die now."

I wonder more often than I should about G–d. I wonder, why would something so powerful and amazing allow the world to get to the point that it has? Why has G–d allowed all of these horrible tragedies to occur? Is G–d going to fix them? If G–d created man in his/her/its image, then why were these "bad" people created?

My response to these questions is: We humans have yet to figure out our lives; maybe G–d still needs to figure out his/her/its life. Maybe G–d is testing us to see how well we can get along. Maybe G–d is seeing how long we can survive with these people. Maybe we need to find the answers on our own. Maybe we need to find the answers together, as a community. Maybe, just maybe.

Judaism as a constant

Do you remember the first day of your freshman year? Some of you probably remember it better than others. Just for you upperclassmen, allow me to refresh your memories: Your whole life changed in a matter of minutes, from everything being predictable and comfortable, to everything being filled with terror and uncertainty. You had a roommate, freedom, fewer classes, worse food and long- distance phone bills.

Renee Cohn

Is that first day coming back to you yet? Well, there's just one more variable in my equation: My mother was hounding me to go to Hillel and gain some sort of religious experience as I grasped my independence.

The second day I was here, Hillel had a welcome barbecue. I walked alone from Orchard Hill to Frat Row on this very overwhelming campus. At the barbecue, I tried to be friendly. I'm not new in religious groups for four years —I just felt so overwhelmed. I didn't go back until the High Holidays.

Finally, I met some Jewish kids in my building who were making an effort to get involved with Jewish life on campus. I joined in, realizing that, for once, something in my life was familiar. I sat at Friday night services and noticed tunes that I had heard since I was a child. I looked around, and for once there were people who seemed familiar—they were Jewish, and there was something comforting in that. It was reassuring that, when everything around me was whirling and changing so fast, my religion stayed the same.

I don't keep kosher or speak Hebrew fluently, I can't lead services or keep Shabbat. But I have found where I stand religiously. I now look forward to taking time to shower and wear a dress and pray for 45 minutes Friday night before tackling another college weekend. I find solace in songs and traditions that become more familiar with each passing week. I guess there's something about Judaism that is unchanging and comfortable, not matter where you live.

There have been more benefits: Friends, social gatherings, Friday night dinner and ruach (spirited songs). I suppose I would have found other ways to get my life on schedule in this crazy place we call UMass, but having services every Friday night leaves me feeling fulfilled, if not religiously, then mentally. Having the time to reflect, have some good bread and shake ten hands at the service's conclusion always has me leaving with a smile. I don't know now what I would do without its familiarity.

I haven't become more religious since I've been at UMass, but maybe I've become a little more spiritual. With all of the other changes I've undergone, it's nice to be reminded that Judaism continues to be one thing I can count on—no matter what environment I'm hurled into next.

Beyond perfection

This is it my friends, the year is drawing to a close and this is the last edition of Jewish Affairs until Sept. The calendar is such that this year we are blessed to begin our summers with the flame of kedusha (holiness). Starting Thursday May 20 at sunset (7:50 p.m.) and continuing until after sunset (9:03 p.m.) on Saturday the 22nd is the festival of Shavuot. This holiday is a celebration of the giving of the Torah at Mount Sinai, and constitutes the climax of the exodus from Mitzrayim (Egypt) which began on Passover.

Hayyim Rothman

Earlier in the year when discussing Passover, I mentioned a number of ideas. I will briefly restate them here. The word "Mitzrayim" is derived from a Hebrew word which means "to limit." The exodus from Egypt is/was a redemption from all the internal and external forces which hold us down by locking us within the boundaries of what we and our peers think we are, keeping us from what we truly are or could become. Due to these limitations, the Midrash states that the Jews of that generation were in danger of assimilating completely into the corrupt Egyptian society, thus becoming both physically and spiritually enslaved.

This is the point at which we begin the story of Shavuot. The physical redemption of the Jewish people was accomplished when G–d let them out of Egypt. Yet it is common knowledge that the mind and soul are not free simply because the body is (i.e. the slave mentality of a free man). Therefore, G–d commanded the Jewish people to offer the Passover sacrifice (in which they slaughtered an animal worshipped as a chief deity by the Egyptians) thus both symbolically and literally separating themselves from Mitzrayim or "limitation." The Jewish people enacted the spiritual redemption that defines true freedom.

Following these events were 49 days of travel and preparation, which on the 50th day culminated with the giving of the Torah. During this 49–day period, the Jewish people went through a systematic process of self- purification, in which each human attribute was drawn to flawless perfection. We continue this process today, by counting the "omer" between Passover and Shavuot, in which each day we perfect an individual aspect of love, strength, beauty, endurance, humility, bonding and nobility, all of which, in combinations of "love of love" and "strength of love," etc., down the line, represent the complete array of human attributes.

Yet even at the end of this process, at perfection itself, we are not finished; perfection is only the very beginning, the starting line of an infinite path. This concept is evident when we step forward to the fiftieth day, the reception of the Torah. Receiving the Torah was not the end, the final "paradise" of rest following the actual work, but rather it was when the Jewish people truly began their work, truly began being Jewish.

To illustrate this idea, I present the analogy of marriage. For months and months before the ceremony, there is preparation — you need kosher caterers, photographers, florists, invitations, registries — the list goes on and on. It is a lot of work (trust me). Then comes the big day, all the work is done, it has become "perfected" because it is complete. Yet this "completion" is but stepping up to the starting line; the day after the ceremony — this is when the work truly begins. Reserving all the caterers and photographers in the world is only a preamble to the holy task of building a good marriage and family life.

There is another issue which I now feel is appropriate to discuss.

"Moshiach! (Messiah!)" This word scares us so much, and scares me. It is often the catch phrase of bizarre cults and offensive fundamentalists. But let us put all that aside, and take a look at this idea in light of the concepts I related above. From the "beginning of time" we have been working, doing, perfecting. There will come a point when this is all finished. Man can make peace with himself, with his world, become perfect; yet this is not day, the reception of the Torah. Receiving the Torah was not the end, the final "paradise" of rest following the actual work, but rather it was when the Jewish people truly began their work, truly began being Jewish.

To illustrate this idea, I present the analogy of marriage. For months and months before the ceremony, there is preparation — you need kosher caterers, photographers, florists, invitations, registries — the list goes on and on. It is a lot of work (trust me). Then comes the big day, all the work is done, it has become "perfected" because it is complete. So now, I give us all a bracha (blessing) that on Shavuot we take that step beyond perfection, into infinity, journeying ever deeper in our path to G–d. Through this, we should reveal the G–dliness inherent in all of existence, thus leading this existence to the redemptive state, to ever deepening and effective work.

Here I bid you all farewell until September, wishing everyone a joyous, kosher and meaningful Shavuot. Have a great summer.

ARTS & LIVING

Internal reflections

A wise man once said, "Writing about music is like dancing about architecture." With that in mind, the time has come to put a final spin on this journalistically-entangled column. Throughout the year I have tussled with various topics encompassing hip-hop's grand orbit, and as the metaphorical gates of summer open I leave you with this last gasp of self-reflexive, pre-meditated thoughts:

Hip-hop is a deeply complex medium, which often makes it a dubious field to bring coverage to. Despite its astounding stature, hip-hop remains an invisible pigment in the pallet of contemporary art. Yet culturally it has unified a plethora of people from innumerable nations, opening conceptual windows for us to embrace its radiant light. Some even attribute hip-hop culture as a more identifiable heritage then our own ethnicity. But as a communal structure, its citizens compose a vast manifold of individuality. Consequently, the hip-hop community is linked through diversity ... of appearance, experience, mentality and opinion. In my writings, I have used the latter two explicitly. Although I consider myself a rigid purist for quality, at times I have been overtly hyper-critical and downright obnoxious. Other instances have captured me immersed in repetitious tangents, spewing a faucet of misguided views. Nevertheless, it has been exuberantly enjoyable.

My aspirations were to provide a supplement to the daily dosage of hip-hop intake and from the very outset, I promoted these weekly words as a contact lens for the third eye. Hopefully your inner vision and understanding of hip- hop has become slightly more transparent as a result. For those who picked up a Collegian and read my rants each week, much love and appreciation. Big up to the Drunk Monk crew (turntablist fraternity). What up Cess. Tone and Trendz, good lookin' on the feedback. JB, Sorenglish, Steve C., my girl "Svoonie," and of course my roommate, Shado. First Born keep doin' your thing, see you in the "real world"!! Plus everyone else UMass and worldwide, let's keep this hip-hop thing pulsating!

Before I exit, I have a few awards to pass out to the deserving contributors.

The Tube's best, worst & finales

To all of you out there, I have bad news. The end of the school year is here! I'm sure you don't need the Collegian to remind you of that, and I'm even more sure that you don't need some stupid Tube Notes columnist to tell you either, but hey, why not? Unfortunately for me, the end of the year also brings the end of Tube Notes. I just hope that my wisdom in this column (or lack thereof) has helped you guide your way through a whimsical world of television delight. Or in the words of Dana Carvey from Wayne's World, "I just hope you didn't think it sucked." But enough of my jabbering, here it is, the moment you've all been waiting for, (okay, I know you don't even care that much, let alone been waiting for it) the Tube Notes year in review.

Best New Series — The wacky world of "Family Guy" has made me look forward to Sunday nights. The animated series is so funny that I need to watch it twice just to make sure I didn't miss any of the jokes. This category wasn't that tough for me to decide, but serious consideration did go to "Futurama," "Felicity" and "The Sopranos."

Biggest Flop — "Becker" is absolutely awful, but what do you expect with Ted Danson? The man made Getting Even With Dad.

Biggest Ratings Diver — "South Park" has officially used up all 15 minutes of its fame. The show was a shorter lived fad than Skidz pants and those snap bracelets that helped kids commit suicide by slitting their wrists with the razor sharp wire inside. Comedy Central has ordered less episodes of the flagging series for next year, and after month-long blocks of repeats this season, I don't think it can afford to give up more time. Look for "South Park" to vanish off the face of the earth after the horrible movie is released this summer. Although I don't think the film could be any worse than Baseketball.

Craziest Season Finale — There's a suicide on "Dawson's Creek." I say no more.

Best Possible Series Finale — "Home Improvement" will be missed even though it should've left a long time ago.

Best Cliffhanger Ending — Did anyone catch the episode of "Felicity" when Todd got hit by a bus? To seriously underestimate it, it was intense!

Worst Attempt to Gain an Audience — Last year I gave this award to "Celebrity Death Match," since we all know that MTV isn't worth the calories burned by pressing the button on the remote to change the channel, we can easily give this award to the network that formally played videos. The winner: "The Tom Green Show." I have to admit that he's funny for about one minute, and then I'm ready to kill him. Now I hate to be the one to break this to you kiddies, but just like Santa Clause, Pro-Wrestling and girls that want me, it's not real! The show is staged and Green is using a script that he didn't even write himself. "The Tom Green Show" is just more proof that MTV will do anything to gain an following of loyal 15-year-old, eminem-listening Adam Sandler wanna-be boys who have less brains in their heads than Beavis & Butthead combined.

Most Anticipated Moment — Last February we watched as one of the great dramatic actors of the decade was killed off of his enormous successful show. The hype leading up "NYPD Blue"'s best episode ever, which involved Jimmy Smit's death, was pretty good and it paved the was for Ricky Schroeder to join the crew.

The C'ya Wouldn't Wanna Be Ya Award — This coveted prize is presented to the person who was around at the beginning of the year, but by season's end, is about as easy to find as O.J. Simpson at a police line-up. The big winner this year is MTV's Jesse Camp. After a year of Jesse's annoying voice, looks and wits, they finally kicked him out, only to replace him with some woman named Thalia. By the way, if you want a preview of next year's winner of this award, it's Thalia.

Best Drama Series — "NYPD Blue" has been better than ever, and Rick Schroeder has been excellent. Look for Dennis Franz to get an Emmy nomination for Best Actor.

Best Comedy Series — I think I've said this in about 20 different columns this year, but "Friends" is the best show on TV, and I can't be convinced otherwise.

Lifetime Achievement Award — "Law and Order" just completed its 200th episode, and has proven itself one of the top series of the decade.

And Finally... Mad Props To — Jacob Fanning, Bryan McAllister and Matt O'Neill. Three people who will not be here next year, and deserve my utmost thanks. Also: Matt, Mike, Rob, Mitch and the Doctor, 5W41, Jay, Angela, Rich Ross and the rest of "The Crew," Ben, Meghan, Chris, Leah, Alicia, LAS, Marcie, Cynthia, Crumpie, Kristin, Melissa, Keri and all the people from N. Attleboro, Katie Holmes & Joey Potter. The entire Collegian staff. And most importantly, (with the exception of Katie Holmes) anyone who has picked up the Collegian and taken a few minutes to read my column this year. My goal for the summer is to turn the Tube off and do something productive for five minutes. We all know that's not happening.

NBC to air Jesse Ventura story

By Bob Thomas
Associated Press

The Peacock is overriding The Body. Minnesota Gov. Jesse Ventura had flatly opposed NBC's plan to make a TV movie on the former professional wrestler's Horatio Alger life story.

But the network stood its ground and on Sunday (May 23) at 9 p.m. EDT will present an unauthorized canvas-to-capitol biography, "The Jesse Ventura Story." "It appears they have put ratings above accuracy and honesty," an angry Ventura said earlier this year.

Not so, countered the network. NBC would "tell his story accurately and respectfully, based on the public record." And so the governor has learned another lesson of political office: Your life, all of it, is fair game for journalists, authors and Hollywood.

Like so many TV movies, "The Jesse Ventura Story" purports to be "based on the true story." It begins in 1964, when Ventura is influenced by watching Sonny Liston box on TV.

The story follows his careers as Navy Seal, bouncer, bodyguard, pro wrestler, wrestling announcer (after leaving the ring because of injuries), bad-guy actor, radio talk-show host, mayor of Brooklyn Park, Minn., and, since January, governor of Minnesota on the Reform Party ticket.

While NBC might be taking its chances crossing Jesse "The Body" Ventura, so too is actor Nils Allen Steward in playing The Guy.

Depicting a famous person in a movie can either be a star-maker or a ticket to obscurity. Stewart, himself a former pro wrestler, shaved off his ponytail and flowing mustache to look more like the smooth-headed governor. He appreciates the movie spotlight but says he isn't dazzled.

"I'm enjoying the whole process," said Stewart, 37. "It's a dream come true."

Sully's this summer and I know you can't either! Luke, you taught me much of what I know, whether it's right or wrong. Or whether I agree with it or not! Thank you.

Aaron Saykin: I can't say I'm happy to see the end. I'll be back next fall, working with other writers, whose company I know won't be quite the same. This was the year of the senior on the Collegian staff, and it will be difficult to envision life in the campus center basement without them. Sanford Appell, we breathed basketball for five months. Although we screamed at each other in your car during our countless road trips, I'd kill for another ride into NYC with you and Koenig... even if it meant watching UMass get its ass kicked at St. John's. Take care, kid. Give my regards to Brooklyn. Casey Kane, as Jack Leaman would say, "I thought ya done a good job." A great job, matter of fact. For two consecutive fall semesters, you showed me how to cover Collegian sports. You took me under your field hockey wing. You better take credit for everything I might do after that. I would never have lasted down here without your help. I'd wish you luck, but you don't need it. You're in a league of your own. Take care of Matty for me.

Governor Teves, you're a born leader. You may get a bit adamant at times, but your heart's in the right place. Give 'em hell at the C.C. Times. Don't ever take shit from anyone. Your work ethic will always speak for itself. Lawrence, hey pal, what can I say, you know your UMass football. I hope you had fun at UNH, wink, wink. Messaros, you... you, you got a gift. Yes you do. YES YOU DO! We had some good times picking on Poindexter. Representing English majors. I wish you the best, seriously. You always think I'm kidding. Christmas Carroll, since you threw that book at Teves, I've been scared shitless of you. In all seriousness, you're a great reporter and a great person. I think you and Paul always fought because both of your hearts are in the right place. It was a clash of personalities. Have fun in Deee-troi, or wherever you go.

Sherwood Forster, you are, by far, one of sweetest people I've ever met. I have no clue how you do it, but you do. Keep smiling and make sure that little Kelly-Ann stays out of trouble. Hey Danielle, you're a Fugazy. What a beautiful, musical last name. It trully is. Even though some people think we should sink Long Island, I say it should stay. I love the cute accent. Emily "White" Trask, the Brockton Bomber. Just have to tell you that I always knew who Corin Redgrave was. Seriously. I just liked to push your buttons. Worked, didn't it. Stay out of trouble and say hi to Marvin Hagler for me.

Jules Fialkow, ride on any good flatbeds lately... around the Collegian maybe. Sorry to hear about the car. Have fun, kid. Shackford, say hi to chief for me. I know how you get police secrets out of him, you vixen, you. Tanya, keep doin your own thing. I'll be your Howard Stern any day of the week, baby. Kevin Monahan, I like your style, pal. You know your arts... and you always shared the inside pages with the sports section. Much appreciated. Julia Sears, I don't know you too well, but you're Forster's friend so you're a friend of mine. Perrault and Corey, I know you guys are WMUA, but I'll miss ya. Have fun calling games for money, not just for the love of it. Laura "Killer" Keller, try not to take anyone's head off. Growl... And all other, upper and underclassmen at the Collegian, I luv ya.

Congrats to UMass softball. Harry and coach Sortino, you two are awesome. Bring home the World Series banner. Carrie Jeffries, even though Harry gets all the press, we think you're a great pitcher down here. As for men's hoop, I can't say I was in love with the relationship, but I would really like to thank Mike Hardisky. You were awesome to the Collegian writers. Bruiser, good luck next year. I think Kirkland and Babul can get you 20 wins. I'm pulling for you. And to anyone else who reads my shit stories, thank you. Peace.

Sanford Appell: Ah, the end of the line. It's been a hell of a ride. Especially this year with the best sports staff this esteemed publication has gathered in recent memory. The coverage was excellent even if the on-field performance wasn't. Seth and Aaron — how about one more trip to NYC? Are we at Iona next year? Nothing beats Manhattan College, one more Coke for the ride back sounds good. Does it get any better than those games in January, Saykin? Did you get a crib in Philly yet Koenig? Question: How many kids from the Collegian are needed to cover this game anyway? Teves, you did a tremendous job this semester, Kobo–thanks for letting me break through after a lengthy waiting period. Best of luck to "Smitty" and Mauser– I'm sure you'll do fine. How about that Daily Collegian Haigis squad? You gave it all you had, Teves. Now let's get back to that lacrosse game. Much respect to Ajmal, Rafael and "Captain" Kirk for keeping things interesting on the court this year. Gonna be a little difficult to win without the best rebounder and best pure–shooter on the team, but we'll see what happens. Thanks so much to Joanie O'Brien for endless cooperation and for a terrific season in the face of adversity. Sincere thanks to Corey and Matt for getting me on the air to shed some insight during the ball games. Solid barbecues, Corey even if I had to jet early. You're definitely the most righteous guy to come out of Vermont. We still want a basketball game WMUA! Dick O'B — enjoy covering the hoops next year, I'll be there in spirit, let's go T! That men's soccer team will be much better next year, I guarantee it. Coach Cannella— it was a pleasure working with you, you were strong in every way this season. Sit in eternal peace. Eric Sopracasa. To RI Zipp, you better make it back kid, and bring Alen with you. We need a Snipers reunion on the diamond. Not too mention more Net–Celtics games at the library. I mean the Fleet Center, Deuceman, and Big "Ange"... where ya at? Sure we can't still get that pink house? One more elevator ride is definitely in order. Isn't that Alen Iverson, lared? Em— my best friend, and biggest supporter, thanks for everything. Got that Littles? Just remember we offer much more than the crossword. For those of you who enjoyed the NBA column, well... you must be Net fans. Special thanks to the New York Post for delivering here in Amherst through sleet, and through Nor'easters, whatever those are. Darryl! Darryl! You can overcome this latest crisis. Mom and Dad– (co-MVP's) thanks for sending me to this fine institution and providing me the opportunity to let my voice be heard on a near-daily basis. Well, time for the youngsters to fo their thing. For now, this is the guy who always tells it like it is no matter how outlandish it may have sounded, signing off.

Matt Frascella: This semester has been the best for sports writing. How can you beat covering the women's softball team? Danielle Henderson, best of luck to you and thanks for putting UMass on the map. I will always remember how nasty your changeup is. I never saw you guys lose all year, and better yet I got to watch the amazing and awe-inspiring Brooke Bartlett practice on the soccer field in between innings. Brooke, you are the reason women play soccer.

Bryan Smith: Let the reign of King Smitty and Queen Mauser begin!! I expect to be bowed to whenever you see me and you will kiss Mauser's feet when you see him!!

Koenig, what time is the Women's Lacrosse game at St. Joe's? You're sure its at 3 p.m., that's a weird time for a game on a Sunday afternoon? OK let's drive to Philadelphia from Long Island so you and Teves can get a byline. Oh, the game was at 1 p.m. and we missed it. Koenig you get a stamp. The only reason why I didn't kill you was because you set us up with a place to stay: Fugazy's house. You're lucky her grandmother's cooking was good and her grandfather was hysterical or you'd be pushing up daisies right now. The NFL Draft helped you out a little, too.

That has been my semester in a nutshell. Time meant nothing when it came to a good argument or some other random activity that happens in the basement of the Campus Center. It's been great though, I wouldn't change it for the world.

I'm going to miss the seniors (Casey, Mike, Paul, and Sanford, to name a few). I'm sorry, but Keller will be missed the most, you all know why. I wish you all luck in whatever endeavors you encounter. Your smiling faces and witiness will be missed greatly. You all went out with a bang!!

I would like to congratulate Coach Julie LaFreniere and the women's track team for winning the A–10 Championship. Coach LaFreniere, you've made my first writing experience a great. I knew nothing about track when I started, but the knowledge that you shared with me throughout the season has been an honor.

To my roommates, its been real. Dan Santella, I love you man!! You're my best friend and I can't wait to work with you next year, D. Peter Berlcal the late night rendezvous must end at some point, but we'll pick up where we left off in the fall. Mattie Cavanaugh, even though you're moving out in the fall, we're still "Boyz 4 Life." One can only hope that our senior year will be as fantastic as this one. Thanks for everything.

A few more things before I'm done. 1. Teves, I'm sick of your @$#*! You need to sit down, get back up, and then apologize. 2. Want any treats? Oh, I mean trees. 3. She's butt!! 4. Coach Stone, Brian Blumsack needed to pitch more...

Gary Mendese: What can I say? This semester has been awesome! This is my second semester as a sports writer and it's been great. This year, the men's gym team had the best season it's ever had, making it to NCAA Regionals for the first time and having one of its members become a four-peat All–American. It was really great to be a part of that. I wanna give a shout out to coach Roy Johnson who is responsible for me coming down to the Collegian in the first place. I want to say thanks for a great semester and good luck to the seniors: Paul, Casey, Sanford, Danielle, Julie, Jill, Laura, Tanya, Stacey, Kevin and everyone else I can't remember. Good luck with your lives!

Kathleen, one of the associate sports editors is taking next semester off from the Collegian to coach field hockey — best of luck and we're looking forward to you coming back in the spring.

All in all, these past two semesters down here have been an incredible experience and (here comes the "misty–eyed" part) I love you all. Well, some of you anyway. See you in the fall!

Adam White: First of all, thanks to The Brady Bunch for the "Stolen Playbook" and "Joe Namath" episodes, without which I never would've become interested in sports in the first place.

Thanks to the ski team, for going ridiculously fast with very little recognition. Special thanks to Ken for some great quotes, and a ton of enthusiasm.

As far as women's water polo goes, what more can be said? You're all simply amazing players, and a lot of fun to work with, too. Thanks to Coach McOsker for always taking the time to talk, and to "the four juniors" for giving me more stuff than I could use in a novel. In particular, thanks to Marci for giving the world's best interviews.

Lastly, thanks to those who read my pieces. I consider the five of you "the wind beneath my wings"...

Jimmy Chen: I am going to keep it short. Best of luck next year for Coach Yarworth and his swimming team. You guys did great this year despite the losses. Secondly, anything but the best for Coach Dietz in NCAA's. For the rest of Collegian and student body, I'm still going out with Ju-Ling, and I'm still living. Don't have too much fun this summer and stay in trouble. Take care y'all, and peace out!

Lawrence Redford: This has been an eventful year both in sports and in life. The women's water polo team and head coach Dan McOsker finished tenth in the nation while wining Easterns (again). Congratulations to them, Coach Bob Newcomb's women's swimming and diving had another strong year. Outside of UMass boxing finally had its unification bout, which proved to be a farce.

Perhaps the greatest thing in UMass sport this year was the football team wining the 1–AA National Championship. Moreover the team sent three players to the NFL, Kerry Taylor in Detroit, Jimmy Moore in New England and Khari Samuel the only player taken via the draft all other were taken through free agency. Personal notes: K–Train good luck, keep in touch, we have done a lot of shit. Jai Boe L.Y.A.F we have be through a lot in a short time we'll always be friends, Teves good luck Peace to the whole Cance Crew. Anyone I forgot, I really didn't forget you, you're just bull shittin'.

Melissa Sherman: Hmmm... Well I kinda got to keep this short but sweet cause I'm not a true Collegian junkie like most of my buddies down here. I don't know, I guess I just like the feeling of the sunshine on my face more than the windowless atmosphere of the campus center basement. But next semester I will join the ranks with the best of you, and you all know who you are. I'll never forget my first article I wrote, the day I met Casey Kane, for all of you who know Casey, you know what I'm talking about. I'd like to wish the Women's Ice Hockey team, my first sports beat ever, the best of luck in the future–hope you gain varsity status someday. Thanks for all those great quotes Nolan! I gotta thank the sports staff for showing me the ropes and hooking me with the most exciting beats in sports! That would be you— Teves and Kobo! And one more thanks to my fav neighbor and co–anchor at WMUA, I couldn't have done it without you guys. And most importantly thanx to DJK infiniti Xinfiniti! See y'all next semester — best of luck to all of you leaving UMass for the real world!!!

Matt O'Neill: I like to thank Coach Dixon for putting up with all my stupid questions all semester. Thanks to Ryan Benharris for listening to all my problems. To Paul Teves, thanks for giving me a chance to write here, Kobo, thanks for letting me write about how UO basketball is better than UMass. As for UO, I'd like to thank to Casey Kane for knowing what I'm talking about when I talk about how cool Mac Court and Autzen Stadium are. Thanks to Smidy for not throwing me in the pond. Last but not least, thanks to the main man at WMUA, Rez, thanks kid. Some last shots out to the wheeler crew (Brooke, Jerm, Gabe, Cory, PC, Kristina) and to the Jenn–Dogg, up in Web.

Seth Szilagyi: First, I'd like to thank Coach Dixon and the men's tennis team for an exciting year. Best of luck next season. I'd also like to give it up for John Galonek. I'm glad he finally decided to admit that he is indeed living la vida loca. Shout out to the AMC staff(bg,jm,), without you I never would have earned that monstrous $5.45 an hour. IC have fun at Emerson. Teves, my name's Szilagyi, not Szilauti. I'm glad you're leaving, you bastard. Most of all I would like to thank my amazing colleague, James Matthew Piehl. He enjoys the company of men and long walks down main street. Anyone who has Arthur Keene for next semester, watch yourself for he is the devil and needs a punch in the face. Rob, keep on dancing, we'll keep on wondering and writing. I'd like to close by saying, Feel, Feel, Feel... Feel my Heat! (Dirk Diggler, Boogie Nights)

James Piehl: Hello out there. It's time for me to fill you in on my memories of this semester. I'll thank Coach Dixon and the tennis team for giving me something to write about. Now that that's out of the way let's chat. I like beer. I had some this semester. I like creative writing because my teacher is insane and dances on desks. But my happiest memory is the time I came down to the Collegian real late and some lady who I don't know tore off my clothes, wrestled me to the ground and forced me to satisfy her carnal desires. No shit, right there in front of the Collegian office on the ground. At first I didn't like it but then she said I was a stud so I got into it and then she did this crazy thing with my nipples and an ice sculpture of Emmanuel Lewis. She's been stalking me ever since. I'll be on campus and she'll yell "hey stud" and "let's do it." I like the attention, though, so I've got that going for me. Which is nice.

accounting for all of UMass' second–half offense. Ten more saves from Sinkwich kept the 49ers at bay, and the Minutewomen held on for a 9–8 victory.

"Katie came up big in that third game— defensively as much as offensively," Clement said.

"Katie really played well all week end," McOsker said. "I'd turn my back, and she'd steal the ball and shoot it into the cage. I'd be left asking what happened."

The win was the 31st of the year for UMass, breaking last year's record for most wins in a season.

Sunday's tourney–closing matchup pitted UMass against the No. 9 Spartans of San Jose State. Fatigue was a big factor for the Minutewomen, whose offense seemed to tread water as the Spartans ran up a 7–2 lead.

"We were a little worn down by the end of the weekend," Clement said. "Their No. 3 seemed to just keep scoring, on lobs and other crazy shots."

UMass finally came to life in the fourth quarter, as a four– goal flurry brought the Minutewomen within one. That was as close as they'd get however, a late insurance goal by San Jose State closed out the scoring at 8–6.

Clement tallied three goals in the loss, giving the Guam native seven on the weekend and one in every game.

"It was a long, draining week end," McOsker said. "Claudia really stepped it up and put the ball in the net when we needed her to."

Grogan led UMass with 11 goals in the tournament. The Maroon and White freshmen also proved to be a factor. Sinkwich piled up an impressive 44 saves, while Goodhue netted four goals and sparkled defensively. Their prodigious play, coupled with the fact that McOsker's roster contains no seniors, gives UMass a stellar outlook for next season.

"Over the last three weeks, the girls really came together and played as a team," McOsker said. "The respect they've earned really helps us out with recruiting. With a good freshman class coming in, the sky's the limit for us next year."

We love the Collegian!

Horoscopes

TAURUS (April 20-May 20) — A question of commitment and integrity is likely to arise today and you have what it takes to come through any personal trial successfully.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20) — Someone is likely to inform you that you have recently made, at least in his or her eyes, the wrong decisions. Is an about-face necessary?

CANCER (June 21-July 22) — Someone you know and love is likely to need your help today in a big way, and you must be prepared to set aside your own desires temporarily.

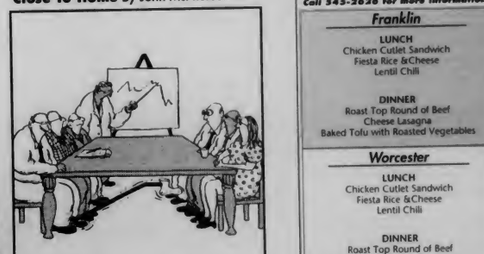
LEO (July 23-Aug. 22) — There is no reason for you to be hasty today, nor must you hesitate. Risks are few, and the chances of success in your personal life are increasing.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22) — Though you are known for your honesty and candid talk, you are likely to encounter one today who has beaten in his willingness to "tell all."

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22) — Try to keep disagreements and personal conflicts to a minimum today. Your duties are many and the time available to you must be used well.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21) — You know what you're doing and you can demonstrate your expertise with style throughout the day. You'll attract numerous supporters.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21) — You may be in the position which requires you to "lay down the law" despite your usually tolerant and forgiving attitude. Don't hedge!



CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19) — You may have to connect with someone today who is more willing and able to deal with harsh financial realities. With guidance, you can prevail.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18) — You may not be as adept at expressing yourself today as you had expected. You may have to rely on someone else to get the more difficult ideas across.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20) — Environmental influences may steer you in a surprising direction today, despite any plans you may have that are "set in stone." Be flexible!

ARIES (March 21-April 19) — If you have the chance to get a little ahead of the game today, do so. Later, you may find that time is ticking away and you're running behind.

The Massachusetts women's water polo team put up a brash fight at the water polo nationals this past weekend.

When all was said and done, they could have hung their heads and dwelled on what might have been. Instead, they kept their chins up and focused on what is to be.

True to their pre–tournament seed, the Massachusetts women's water polo team captured a 10th place finish at this weekend's National Championships in Davis, California. UMass dropped an emotional 6–5 sudden death overtime contest to host UC–Davis, then knocked off No. 15 Michigan (8–4) and No. 11 Long Beach State (9–8) before closing play with an 8–6 loss to No. 9 San Jose State.

"We proved to the country that we can play at the top national level," said Coach Dan McOsker, who has guided the Minutewomen to a 61–14 record in his two seasons at the helm. "We can really build on that for next year."

UMass came into the tournament as an instant underdog, having drawn the No. 7 Aggies as its opening opponent. The atmosphere at the opening swim–off was electric, as hordes of Davis fans rocked Hickey Pool and made communication difficult for both teams.

The din subsided rapidly, however, as All–American Katie Grogan blasted in two quick goals. No sooner could Davis answer than UMass juniors Claudia Clement and Marci Hupp tallied another pair of scores, pushing the lead to 4–1.

"We came out really strong, really pumped up," Clement said. "I think we kind of scared them."

Any fears the Aggies had were short–lived, as three unanswered Davis goals locked the score and forced overtime. Despite its early fireworks and solid defensive play, UMass felt the momentum shifting.

"We cashed in on our scoring opportunities early, theirs came in the second half," McOsker said. "It wasn't a matter of us letting up."

Davis rode their late surge into the extra set, notching the go–ahead goal in the first of two three–minute OT periods. The second period saw a desperate UMass team running out of chances, until an improbable goal by junior Laurie Edwards with three ticks remaining silenced the crowd and forced sudden death.

"I knew that we were up a man with very little time on the clock," said Edwards, who took a pass from Clement and went high–left for the score. "Thank God that ball went in."

The celebration was short–lived, however, as Aggie Lenelle Dorfi put away a goal and the Minutewomen with 1:17 remaining in sudden death.

Freshman goalkeeper Dana Sinkwich set a school record with 16 saves in the contest. McOsker clarified that Davis' astronomical shot total was more indicative of the game's length than any Maroon and White defensive let–down.

"We were two very evenly matched teams," McOsker said. "Because of all the overtime, we played essentially two games."

UMass then faced No. 15 Michigan Wolverines, whom the Minutewomen had beaten 9–2 at February's Villanova Invitational. Behind the balanced attack of Grogan, Edwards, and freshman Jacqui Goodhue (two goals each), UMass prevailed in an 8–4 final.

"The hardest part against Michigan was getting over the emotional drain of our first game," McOsker said.

"We knew we couldn't lose this game," said Clement, referring to the team's 10–10 first half against the Wolverines. "We realized we needed to wake up and start putting it all together."

The '49ers of Long Beach State were next up for the Maroon and White. Californian Grogan used this game as her personal showcase, racking up five goals and Finishing up in tenth place at nationals, the Minutewomen closed their season with a new school record of 31 wins.

A look back on the year with misty–eyed memories

For all of you who read the Sports page every day and have no clue what we really do down here, here's a group roundup of the year that was.

Pitcher: Paul Teves
Catcher: Michael Kobylanski
First Base: Seth Koenig
Second Base: Kathleen Ralls
Shortstop: Casey Kane
Third Base: Sanford Appell
Left Field: Aaron Saykin
Center Field: Bryan Smith
Right Field: Matt Frascella
Designated Hitters: Adam White, Gary Mendese, Melissa Sherman
Middle Relievers: Matt O'Neill, Jimmy Chen and Lawrence Redford
Closers: Seth Szigyi and James Piehl

Paul Teves: It's time again for misty eyed memories and what has happened during the course of this semester. Well I don't want to bore you two days in a row with my personal stories so I'm going to keep this one short and bore you tomorrow instead.

So here is the story of a semester in short. First I would just like to give props to the football team for winning the NCAA Division I–AA National Championship on my birthday. Thanks guys, the trip to Chattanooga was a great one, and it was excellent being a fan all season. Made every home game this season and the Championship. Wear the rings with pride.

I also had a great season following around the men's hockey team. They did a great job breaking all sorts of records. I would like to thank coach Joe Mallen and Mike McComsky for all your help. It was a good time seeing all of greater New England and traveling to every Hockey East school.

The other sport I got to cover this season was the women's lacrosse team. They had a solid season. Ladies, don't worry — I still think you got ripped in Philadelphia. The refs sucked and should brush up on the rule book. But despite the officials, the women did a great job. I would like to thank coach Francesca McClellan for helping me out so much. Thank's for staying patient with me as I got a chance to really learn the sport.

Thanks ladies for all your help. I would also like to thank the team for putting up with us on trips and allowing us to travel to exotic places like Syracuse, N.Y., New Hampshire and Philadelphia again and again.

Thanks to Ryan Nadeau and his great factual knowledge of the game and his help throughout the season. Good luck with the job in Kentucky. — if your going to Kentucky that is.

Would also like thank the entire staff at the Collegian. But would like to especially thank the sports staff. I'm going to miss all you clowns. Peace to my boys Koenig, Smitty, Kobo, Saykin, Frascella, Appell, Kane, Kathleen Ralls, White, O'Neill, Redford, Murphy and Owens. Thanks guys for all your help.

Being a senior this is one of my final stories, so "Last words — out."

Michael Kobylanski: It was a very interesting year to say the least. I could go on and on about all of the places that I've been to this year, but why talk about that again.

I've written so many stories this year, so I really don't have any ambition to type anymore. Because of this, I'm going to make this short and sweet.

Thanks to all of the coaches that I interacted with this year, especially coaches Rudy. Mallen and Stone. I enjoyed covering all the clubs, and look forward to another exciting year of UMass women's soccer, hockey and baseball in 1999–2000.

To all of the seniors on the sports staff, thanks for your contributions to the page over the past few years. Have fun going into the real world now.

To everyone else who is returning, I plan on sticking around for a while even if I'm not in charge anymore.

Well, that's about it here. More trips are in the works for next year, and hopefully some more memorable moments. I guess I'll just have to wait until then to find out, but for now its off to home sweet home (again) for three months of nothing but rest and relaxation. I can't wait.

Casey Kane: I felt a real connection to the team I covered my freshman year. To tell you the truth, I never thought I would feel that when I switched from baseball to men's lacrosse my sophomore year. Three years later, I'm hear to tell you that it is the men's lax team I will miss most of all when I finally do leave this campus (which may not be for a while, if you ask the registrar — just kidding. mom and dad).

The names flow easily: Brendan Glass, John Kasselakis, Mike DelPercio, Harold Drumm, Chris Martens, John O'Connor. They — make me fall in love with a sport I couldn't understand when I sat in the pressbox at Hofstra for one of the best games I've ever seen.

With those guys, my sophomore year, I got to see a dramatic 6–4 win in the NCAA tournament over Hofstra and another one of the best games I've ever seen, this time a loss to Princeton tanother five minutes and you guys would've had them).

This year the team is young. They will grow, and they will be good, mark my words. But I feel lucky to say that I got to cover them. I feel doubly lucky that I've had the distinct pleasure of working with coach Greg Cannella, one of the classiest guys in sports.

I didn't think that connection would be there with lacrosse, that same bond I felt with the baseball team, a great group of guys (especially Brian Samela) in their own right. But it is there. Stronger.

I will be back on this campus (I technically have to leave first), and I will return to watch the Minuteman lacrosse team. When I do I'll be cheering as loud as anyone.

Thank you's: To all my sports boys, I love you more than anything. Don't forget me. To all the coaches and staff I've had the pleasure of working with, thank you for your help and patience.

Thanks for the ride. Too bad it's over so soon.

Seth Koenig: The football team was 2–9 my freshman year. When I came to cover them as a sophomore, I turned them around — National Championship in 1998. Oh yeah, and some guy named "Whipple" helped a little, too. For a group of guys who really had every right treating me like a third wheel (or 60th or whatever), they always stayed very kind to me.

Covering hoops was kind of tough at times, but you know, there's something about sitting on press row at the Mullins Center every game that will be sorely missed. There's a really invigorating feeling about it.

All said and done, though, my team is the women's lacrosse team. Barring an ill–timed internship or a Canadian invasion or something, that will be the only team that I will cover for four straight years — and what a lucky guy I am for those four years. Everybody in that program is accommodating to the max, making my job as easy as it can be when I'm broke all the time. Coach McClellan, I still can't believe you stay calm after some of those games... especially being pregnant. I was pulling my hair out on the sidelines, but she just plays it cool. I can't fathom.

I also can't fathom covering a team nearly as efficiently without having Ryan Nadeau feeding me information all the time.

Now for the part of the column where I give shout–outs to all sorts of people the common reader doesn't know nor will ever care about while commenting on a handful of inside jokes:

Teves, it's been schnick. Living at the same place, working at the same place and covering the same team might have made me beat a lesser man with a tire. We learned all sorts of valuable lessons of life, like not to call polar bears named "Craig", "Binky", and that when in Philly, get a cheese steak at Jim's. It's essential. South Street is my home away from home — whether that's good or bad, I haven't figured out yet.

Sanford Appell and Aaron Saykin, you guys are my basketball cronies — I'll never forget the trips to New York City (my other home away from home). Schwilly B, thanks for letting Teves and I borrow your car every weekend. That trip to NY. Draft was the bomb–diggity.

Kobo, Ralls: my fellow editors. Good job this semester.

Casey Kane and Matt Vautour is the best couple a future editor in chief could know. Both of you have been invaluable to my development this year, and, along with Mike Messaros, I have to say my debt of gratitude is... uh, big, or something.

Mauser, I'll see you in the fall. Let's go get another title.

Kathleen Ralls: Jumping back onto the sports staff after a semester of exchange as a USC Gamecock was interesting, to say the least. With a whole new look, the Collegian sports staff has been revived, with some fun new faces. Saykin, you're not new, and frankly, if I didn't have to listen to you yakking while I am trying to write, one of my stories might get sent once in a while! See Teves, I have a sense of humor if you're nice, but only if you're nice! Sanford, I'm sorry I couldn't show you a better time at baseball! Smitty, it was a lovely dinner with the fam, even if Kobo had to come! Koenig, may the force be with you as you deal with another Chelmsford girl — DEB! Diane, welcome to the basement! To my friends in business, I don't care if you don't write, you rock at the Collegian party! Kobo, we've been through it all, I don't need to say anymore. I feel good that I kept your hormones intact during baseball season — just kidding. I'll see you at Dave! Baseball has had it rough as of late, and I think it has to do with the tunes Awdycki and Charlie spin, no more Kid Rock! Amy and Mike, we had it good at Earl Lorden, even if he tried to break down the press box door one too many times! See you guys next fall somehow, somewhere! if all works out all right, I will be coaching some Hurricanes to their own championship this fall, and I will legitimately have something to do with that! But I'll be back for hoops Mauser, you'd better sit tight. This is a long distance request across the pond to Lauren, who is riding camels on African beaches or whatever her crazy heart desires: and to my best, best friend, Court, you won't see this but I can't wait for some Oreo yogurt at

SGA year ending; two positions open

By Danielle Fugazy
Collegian Staff

Today marks the closing of senate meetings for the year. After meeting every Wednesday night for the past two semesters the University of Massachusetts Student Government Association (SGA) is closing down with only Speaker of Senate and Associate Speaker positions left to debate and finally vote on.

This is not a public election, only senators get to vote. Although the candidates for each position are not quite determined yet because anyone can decide to run up until tomorrow night's meeting there are a few people that have said they are likely to run.

Jennifer Worcester, the governor of Orchard Hill Residential Area is expected to run against Mike Billard, a senator from Commuter Area. Right now Lisa Cook holds the position of Speaker of the Senate but will not be running again because she will be graduating this May.

"The elections should be held earlier, like the president and trustee positions. If the elections weren't held so late there would be more time for the speaker to pass on information about the job. I wish the new speaker good luck and to have a good year because it is challenging," said Cook.

As of now only Jennifer Texeria running is for the position of Associate Speaker, but that could change by tomorrow night's meeting. The winner of this race would be replacing Jodi Bailey, who is not running because she will be graduating this May.

As she departs, she passed on a few tips to her replacement. "They need to get to know all the senators and have a good working relationship with them to get things done. You also have to work hard and be willing to advocate on behalf of everyone in order to be good at this job."

No rest for crime during last weekend

By Stacey Shackford
Collegian Staff

The end of the semester has yielded an assortment of crimes at the University of Massachusetts. This past weekend, a naked track runner was arrested and charged with disorderly conduct, a pizza delivery driver was assaulted, a student had to be escorted off stage at Spring Concert and several potted plants were stolen from a French Hall greenhouse.

The weekend began with the French Hall potted plant theft. Greenhouse staff reported the breaking and entering and larceny at 7:47 a.m. Friday morning. According to UMass police reports, four 14–by–23–inch panes of glass were removed and several potted plants were stolen.

Three men were arrested early Saturday morning in Lot 32.E. south of Massachusetts Avenue, and charged with disorderly conduct and malicious destruction of property more than $250. A plainclothes officer says he witnessed a group of males damaging a motor vehicle parked in the lot, and observed a man later identified as Andres Ortega, 21, of 16 Belanger St., Amherst, attempted to smash a window of the vehicle.

The officer further alleges that two other males — Patrick M. Priester, 21, of 99 Upper East Hoosac St., Adams and Christian J. Hass, 21, of 51 Mill Hill Rd., Cheshire — kick another vehicle. There was damage to the vehicle's driver's side window and door.

That same morning, a pizza delivery driver was assaulted shortly after making a delivery in Southwest Residential Area. According to police reports, the driver was making a delivery in the area of John Adams and John Quincy Adams Residence Halls when he had a verbal altercation with some individuals outside. When he returned after making the delivery, the altercation continued and escalated into an assault. The driver was hit in the head and shoulder area and knocked to the ground, at one point using pepper spray to ward off the assailant.

Officers on patrol in the area interceded and at least two Individuals fled, reports stated. The driver suffered contustions to his forehead, chin, left hip and arms. He was transported to Cooley Dickinson Hospital in Northampton, treated and released. Police have identified at least one individual involved in the altercation. The incident is still under investigation.

During Spring Concert, Noel B. Frazier had to be escorted out of the Mullins Center after jumping on stage during Cypress Hill's performance. After a struggle involving many security personnel and police officers, Frazier, 19, of 236 Round Swamp Rd., Southampton, N.Y., was arrested and charged with disorderly conduct.

UMass track and field team member Christopher W. Howell was also charged with disorderly conduct — after he and 30–40 others were discovered running around the track near Boyden Gymnasium naked. According to police reports, Howell harassed officers who insisted he dress, and was arrested (in his underwear) when he finally complied but became confrontational.

Meetings could heal wounds at UHS

Administrators and employees address problems

By Jill Carroll
Collegian Staff

The road to reconciliation may be a long one, authorities say, between University Health Services (UHS) employees and administrators as meetings aimed at addressing an outpouring of employee grievances continue.

Nick Marshall, employee/labor relations administrator, said the meetings, which began in March, have been progressing. He said the groundwork of the meetings is being worked on but the issues haven't been fully addressed yet.

"Some positive steps have happened," Marshall said.

He said it would be up to the group of approximately 15 people, a mix of union members and UHS administrators, to decide what the major issues are.

Addressing the problems and figuring out how the meetings will run are "all sort of mixed in," he said.

But Service Employees International Union (SEIU) Amherst chapter President Tom Coish, said the meetings were going slowly and the complaints weren't addressed yet.

Coish said he hasn't attended all four of the meetings but he has been told that they "haven't talked about substantial" issues.

He pointed out that the fact–finding report was released in December but it took until March for meetings to begin. Taking that time to address the issue "seems not to be an uncommon thing on this campus," he said.

Marshall could not estimate when the meetings would be finished but said they will be going on for "quite a while."

The meetings came after a report outlining how UHS employees felt about their working conditions by fact finder, Nancy Peace.

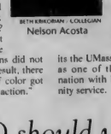
Peace met with many UHS employees over several days last fall to collect as much information about the situation as possible.

Peace was enlisted by UHS administration after a survey by the SEIU was taken of UHS employees a year ago and the University ombudsman released his summation of the survey.

The survey and ombudsman's report found a majority of UHS employees unhappy with their work conditions. Many reported they were overworked, underfunded and were afraid to complain because of retaliation from administrators. Several said UHS Director Bernette Melby in particular, caused some of the problems.

Members of the group meeting with outside facilitator, Mary Ellen Shea, are not permitted to speak to the press.

The admissions process debate: two leaders give their views on the future



By Laura Forster
Collegian Staff

As the spring 1999 semester comes to a close, the status of the revised admissions policy is leaving some with mixed feelings as to the future diversity of the incoming student body for years to come.

Director of Asian, Latino, African and Native American (ALANA) Affairs Office Nelson Acosta feels that in meeting the needs of minorities on campus, "UMass has come a long way and they have a long way to go."

Acosta, a UMass alum and an active member on–campus for 17 years, fears that the admissions policy will affect the future of the student body. "I'm afraid UMass is going to be a safety school for affluent whites who can't get in anywhere else.

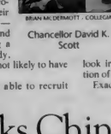
"We've got to wake up and smell the coffee, racism is alive and well, our data shows preference for white people," said Acosta.

BETH KIMBORIAN - COLLEGIAN

Nelson Acosta

Acosta feels that UMass's mission should be to "provide access to those people that need it most in this state."

"I like Chancellor [David K.] Scott a lot. Do I think he made a bad decision? Yes, I do." Acosta feels that the decision to not make race a priority in admissions did not need to be made and as a result, there is a stigma that "people of color got here because of affirmative action."



As plans for the new Commonwealth College are receiving its finishing touches, some concerns have been raised about whether UMass should place more emphasis on helping disadvantaged students gain access rather than upgrade the standards of students admitted, as done by the Honors College.

However, Scott feels "there is room for both" and says, "We're not a single monolithic institution." Scott also credits the UMass Commonwealth College as one of the most unique in the nation with its emphasis on community service.

Scott has said repeatedly in the past that he knows there is a direct correlation between socioeconomic background and SAT scores and proposes to recruit more students of low socioeconomic background as part of the revised admissions policy.

Although the University of Michigan tried to make socioeconomics a factor in their admissions policy — instead of race — and failed in achieving a diverse student body, Scott feels UMass is not likely to have the same result.

"We are probably able to recruit more students of a lower economic bracket than the University of Michigan. We're likely to have a higher percentage."

BRIAN MCDERMOTT - COLLEGIAN

Chancellor David K. Scott

Scott feels that with the newly appointed admissions task force, there is an "affirmative action of a different kind" in effect on campus.

Under Scott's suggestion, Provost Cora B. Marrett and interim Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs Javier Cevallos recently appointed an Undergraduate Admissions Task Force to look into the recruitment and retention of a diverse student body.

Exact numbers for the percentage of ALANA students of the incoming 1999 freshman class were not able to be determined by the time of print, but Scott said he is confident that the incoming class will go above the 13 percent of ALANA students (which is the percentage of ALANA students in Massachusetts high schools prepared for college).

In addition to the newly appointed Undergraduate Admissions Task Force which will primarily focus on recruiting ALANA students, Scott said an old task force has been reinstated by Cevallos to work on better retention of ALANA students. The new task force will work on retention as well. Such proposals for retention include more Residential Assistance Programs (RAP) and more advising

Psych professor: NATO should withdraw

By Jake Lilien
Collegian Staff

University of Massachusetts psychology Professor Ervin Staub, an expert on the psychological roots of mass violence, has suggested that the United States and NATO withdraw troops from the former Yugoslavia.

"In times like these, the international community needs to act both to protect people and to initiate and lead negotiations that, over time, can work out difficult situations," he said.

Staub is the author of Roots of Evil: The Origins of Genocide and Other Group Violence, which he calls "a description of how genocide and mass killing come about, and how difficult conditions in a society, conflicts between groups, scapegoating, destructive ideologies and the passivity of bystanders lead to... the evolution of increasing violence."

Staub has extensively studied the psychological basis of war, as well as violence amongst children.

"Violence by groups usually evolves, and without the right constraining forces it tends to intensify," said Staub. "One can see that from both Serbian violence and also from the NATO bombings."

Staub rationalized ethnic–cleansing of Albanians in Kosovo as a result of past violence against Serbs.

"Until late in the 19th century, for 500 years, [Serbia was] ruled by Turkey," he said. "During the second World War, hundreds of thousands of Serbs were killed by a fascist Croat Republic. When communism collapsed, and Yugoslavia began to collapse, that was very threatening to the Serbs. Their violent reponses intensified over time."

He stated that a "very early response" by the international community could have prevented the current situation, in which thousands of ethnic Albanians have been forced from Kosovo.

Staub also asserted that, while International Interven-

US asks China to accept apologies

By Tom Raum
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Despite China's outrage at NATO's bombing of its embassy in Belgrade, the Clinton administration said yesterday it did not think Beijing "at the end of the day" would block a diplomatic solution to the conflict in Yugoslavia.

But Defense Secretary William Cohen told Congress any peace plan that included a partial pullout of Serb troops from Kosovo was unacceptable, saying it "would mean a total victory" for Yugoslav President Slobodan Milosevic.

He said there was still no evidence that Milosevic would make good on a promise of such a withdrawal.

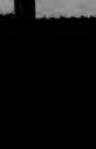
Cohen also told a Senate Appropriations subcommittee hearing that China should accept President Clinton's apologies in the accidental bombing of their embassy in Belgrade and "answer his phone calls."

Chinese President Jiang Zemin had not yet responded to a request by Clinton to talk by phone, nor has Foreign Minister Tang Jiaxuan taken a call from Secretary of State Madeleine Albright.

Also, U.S. Ambassador James Sasser was told by Chinese authorities he should not attend ceremonies for the three Chinese journalists killed in the bombing, State Department spokesman James P. Rubin said.

However, the Chinese media informed the Chinese people yesterday of the American apology for the first time.

Rubin said he did not expect China to use its U.N. Security Council veto "at end of the day if a diplomatic resolution is found where President Milosevic has agreed to NATO's condition... It would be contrary to their longstanding claim to resolve this question peacefully."



Albright, in a broadcast to the Serb people in Yugoslavia, disputed their government's continuing claims that ethnic Albanian refugees in Kosovo were fleeing NATO bombardment, not Serb troops and police.

tion was necessary in preventing the expulsion of ethnic Albanians, the ongoing NATO war is unnecessary, and has revealed a similar pattern of escalating hostility.

"The intensification of the NATO bombing, and the increasing destruction of human lives, again shows that violence on any side tends to increase," he said. "A more flexible response would have been highly desirable."

He called for an end to the bombings, and suggested that negotiations begin "at a very high level."

"If President Clinton, Kofi Annan and other high-level leaders, including the Russians, had directly engaged with Milosevic, that may have contributed to a feeling of safety, and the positive identity that Serbs need. for all students, although nothing has been designed for ALANA students specifically.

As for Acosta — who hopes the task forces are "not another committee that writes a report and nothing gets done" — lack of financial support is the heaviest pressure on ALANA students. In addition, Acosta feels the lack of diverse staff on campus is another issue still in need to addressing.

"There are departments who have never had people of color," said Acosta. However, Acosta feels the problem is not so much in Scott's hands, but as student protestors have said, in President William Bulger's, the Board of Higher Education's and perhaps even the conservative right-wing government leaders' hands.

As students and administration of the Undergraduate Admissions Task Force get ready to meet in June, Acosta says "I think my days at UMass are counted." Acosta feels that despite his long history at UMass he is not paid as well as he should be. "I pay the price for speaking."

Fundraiser testifies at trial

By Pete Yost
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Weaving a tale of intrigue, fundraiser Johnny Chung testified yesterday he took $300,000 from a Chinese intelligence official who wanted to re-elect President Clinton. He alleged he later was offered hush money to discourage his cooperation with the FBI.

Chung, who once compared his donations to subway tokens that bought him entry into the White House and was dismissed by national security officials as a "hustler," told lawmakers in his first public testimony that he never acted as an agent for the Chinese government.

And he testified he felt uncomfortable channeling the $300,000 into political contributions, so he spent most of it on business instead.

But Chung testified he had contacts with the head of Chinese military intelligence, Gen. Ji Sheng De, who said he was eager to give money to help re-elect Clinton. And Chung detailed how a 2 1/2-year political giving spree won him access to the White House for his well-heeled Chinese clients.

"I have mixed feelings about the president and the first lady, but I can't help but think that they used me as much as I used them," Chung told the House Government Reform and Oversight Committee.

Chung also alleged that a U.S. Embassy official in Beijing, who has since left the State Department, helped him get visas for dozens who wanted to visit the United States.

Chung alleged he did financial favors for the official, Charles Parish, and took him to a Democratic fund-raiser and a private tour of the first lady's office.

Chung said he ended his relationship with Parish after the president of a Chinese beer company asked him to deliver "a shopping bag of money and visas" to Parish.

The State Department is investigating Parish, spokesman Maria Rudensky said Tuesday. She declined further comment.

Majoring in newspapering

There is a line in a Dorothy Parker poem that says "... regret is no part of my plan."

I'm here to tell you it ain't part of mine either. That, if there is anything, makes this transition from Collegian lifer to out-to-pasture somewhat easier. I know that I got all I could out of the UMass experience, with some unexpected bonuses, don'tcha know.

So, like pretty much every senior on this page, I'm going to impart my wisdom (don't worry, it won't take long) and say a few goodbyes (and if you don't recognize the names, too bad; this is my column, not yours).

First, the eternal catch-phrase of those who have been there: get involved. Yeah, I know it sounds hokey, but to tell you the truth, getting involved with the Collegian is the best thing I've ever done for myself. This place has been my home base. I have found my career, and more importantly, I have found my friends here. I love every one of you.

Second, give us a break. There are over 150 student employees down here, many who don't get paid a red cent for the time they put in (sometimes over 40 hours a week), working to put out a high quality product everyday. We try — and come pretty damn close — but we are not professionals. We are students and we have other lives, we have other jobs, we have other things pulling us in every direction. But for most of us, this is our love. Give us credit.

Besides, we work in a basement. That means having no idea if it is sunny out, no idea when it got dark, no idea what the other students (the ones with free time) are doing. So if we aren't at an event and you haven't told us about it, don't expect us to be psychic. We have some supernatural powers, but most are the alcohol-tolerance variety.

Casey Kane

Third, don't worry too much about your grades. Too many people on this campus are worked up over grades and test scores and the like. Chill. I know I am a smart person, but the registrar doesn't. And frankly, I don't care if the registrar thinks I can't add (numbers over three digits long and I really can't).

I have taken courses that have absolutely fascinated me (Journalism Ethics) and classes I had to be bribed out of bed for (Race, Sex and Social Class). But I know that I have gotten a pretty decent education, partly because of my classwork, partly because I wasn't all that religious about that classwork.

Fourth, get to know some of your teachers. I'm really lucky that because of my status as a journalism major I've been able to take two, count 'em, two classes with Karen List. I can't put into words how much I've learned from her (and Karen, it's a lot, even if it doesn't look like it on my tests). I hope I can make you proud to say you were my teacher.

I've also been fortunate to work with B.J. Roche, who has kicked my ass almost as much as my parents have; Joe Quinlan, a kindred spirit if ever there was one; Bill Sutton and Dan Covell, Sport in Popular Culture is by far one of the best classes ever; Lisa Pike Masteralexis and her T.A. Ken Martin (ahhh...); Carol Barr; Steve Simurda, that cookie made me feel like a million bucks.

And I meant what I said before. I am smart.

You can tell I'm smart by the company I keep. Let me tell you about a few of my peeps. I'll start, of course, with my parents. Bill and Eileen. Man, I know I'm biased, but they really are the two greatest people on this planet. I'm serious. If you doubt me, you probably haven't met them.

My parents have kicked my ass all my life. They've always wanted me to do my best, get the most out of every situation. They've always wanted me to succeed and be happy. They understand now what my happiness is... sitting press row at a hoop game, going to countless Red Sox games, working at the Collegian. They know that I have to decide what matters to me most. Hopefully, they know how much I love them and how proud I am to be their daughter.

I hope I make them as proud some day.

I have to admit that I'm getting sentimental about this last column (if you don't count the ones in sports). I have spent four years in this basement living, learning, laughing.

I've made friendships that I dearly hope will last a lifetime. If this school offered the Collegian as a major program, I'd be a Rhodes scholar. I hope I've left some kind of mark.

I'll miss this most of all.

Casey "Coach" Kane is a Collegian columnist and plans to one day sip margaritas served by monkey waiters.

What college is all about

It is unbelievable how quickly time flies. It seems like just yesterday I was attempting the death-defying feat of moving into the dorms in Southwest, but in actuality it was four years ago. I guess in the grand scheme of things four years isn't really all that long, but if I think about it like that then I will start to realize the futility of our entire existence! Anyway, there are just a couple of things that I want to say about my college experience. And I am sure that it will be just as goofy as everyone else's senior column.

When I first decided to come to UMass for college, I was not very happy about it. I had wanted to go to New York University, but that just wasn't happening. Even when I first began going to school here, it was still kind of a joke to me. I always felt that I had to explain my reasons for why I "ended up" here.

As my first semester started to get going, I began really to enjoy my classes. I actually even felt that I was learning something. Although this was the case, I still was not quite ready to admit that I liked going to school here.

I guess it took me about a year and half to actually realize how important this place was to me. As my sophomore year came to a close, I had gained a number of friends who I knew had had a very large impact on my life.

Then, it started to piss me off when people would ask where I went to school and when I told them, their only reply would be: "oh." Some people would try to be nice and say, "Well, that's a pretty good school."

My classes suddenly began to have relevance to me and to my life. I started to recognize familiar patterns throughout my course work. Although this may sound strange, I was able to draw connections between virtually all of my classes — including seemingly unrelated courses such as "The Microbiology of Cancer and Aids and "Contemplating Nature" or "Intro to Oceanography" and "Virginia Woolf." When I happened upon this realization, I think that this is where I came into being as an adult. I don't mean that I am now responsible or something like that. I mean adult in the sense I started to grow at a deeper level. I am able to realize that I am not the center of the universe.

I have come to believe that in some bizarre way, this is what going to college is all about. It is not about merely gaining knowledge or training for a specific job or about partying all the time, but it is about learning to understand yourself, the world, and your place in the world (both your insignificance and your importance).

Emily Trask

While I don't think that going to college can provide all of the answers to the mysteries of life (in fact, sometimes it may cause someone to question all the more), it can — if you accept it — provide you with the tools necessary for surviving life.

I am going to get a bit cheesy now — but, hey it's my senior column.

Despite what I have learned, if I hadn't come to school here, there are so many wonderful people that I probably never would have met. The importance of these many friendships that I have acquired and developed, over the last four years, is immeasurable. Though I may not keep in close contact with every one of them, I will never forget them (unless I happen to get regile).

Although my four years here at UMass have flown by, the education that I have obtained here has been absolutely invaluable to me. And while I don't have any specific plans about what I am going to do after May 23rd, I think that my education will help to enable me to achieve the things that I want to achieve, regardless of what that may be (even if I want to be a lounge singer).

So now, when I look back on my decision to enroll at UMass — though I was initially hesitant about it — I am very happy that I did.

Emily Trask is a Collegian staff member and really does want to be a lounge singer. She's even got the dress.

Learning about life

College is a series of events, where you learn interesting things about life, society, history and about the field in which you want to work. For some it's also a place where you learn to socialize for the first time, and learn a lot about yourself, and where you learn to be a responsible man or woman.

Well now that I have been through four and a half years of college life I can officially tell you that this is all bullshit. I haven't learned any of that crap, and what I have learned is how to become a tremendous alcoholic.

Let's face it — I never went to class anyway. The three things that excited me the most on campus were the females — especially in the spring, the bars — especially Mike's Westview on Wednesday nights, and intramural softball, but we never won the shirt.

Let's start conveniently with the idea of learning a lot. When I was freshman, I was an accounting major, and I did really well in accounting classes, with the exception of management, marketing — well everything besides "Accounting I" and "Accounting II." Then I learned my first lesson, and that is that I don't want to be an accountant. I then changed my major to English. People told me sophomore year that it was not going to get me anywhere. I learned a lot of useless stuff about Henrik Ibsen, and 20th century English poets and playwrights.

I then decided junior year to become a journalism major. If I knew then what I know now I would have become a communication or sports management major and just written for the Collegian, but who knows these things. So I became a journalism major, took a lot of useless classes, and then wrote and now have places offering me a job because of my Collegian experience.

Paul Teves

Now — about all the other things I involved in college. I felt out of the loop and wanted to be involved in sports. I was an avid two year player of intramural softball, top gun and co-ed. But co-ed sucks for all you sportsmen out there. The other sport was rugby, which I played here for three weeks and almost had a jacket — that was fun. Even though I was one of the smaller guys on the team.

The women on this campus! This topic could be a column all by itself. Remember when I said that you're supposed to learn a lot about social interaction in college? You do interact — I would imagine pretty frequently, probably every time you go to the bars. But that doesn't necessarily mean you have learned how to act socially or how to understand the opposite sex. After all, almost every relationship I've had here was either with a girl with issues — which she made up for with her body — or a girl I really liked who left, due to graduation or studying abroad (studying a broad?) or something like that.

So if anything, college makes you more weary of women, but like I said, that is a column by itself.

College is just a haze for me — but I have been taking stats. For instance: I have gone to Rafters 215 times, Applebees like 35, Mike's Westview 38, Barsie's 104. I'm not sure of the count on the Pub, Delano's and Amherst Brewing Company. I have visited the dorms 3,904 times.

I've been to Philadelphia probably more than people who live there. All the eating places about 3,000 times, but you know none of this is important, because I'm just a college student who hasn't learned a thing about what I've mentioned and you shouldn't take anything I say seriously.

When Bryan Smith speaks you should all listen, but he doesn't really know what he's talking about either, after all he attended Northeastern before UMass. He should definitely apologize to the entire UMass community for that.

So listen, just have a good time while you're here, and don't let your parents tell you that you should be getting good grades, because like I said that diploma will just look nice on the wall.

10 things I hate about UMass

I leave UMass with a conflicting sense of pride and disgust. If there's anything I've learned in my years as a senator, activist and reporter, it's that this University is forked up, if you know what I mean — and I think you do.

Oh UMass, how dost thou disgust me? Let me count the ways:

1) The Honors Program. That little "Meet UMass" seminar is a crock of lard. The entire purpose is to meet other honors students through stupid little "activities," which I could never attend because I was too busy getting involved in real activities and meeting real UMass students.

Stacey Shackford

2) The classics department. Only recently have I met some cool cats and a super professor (yay Classics 381!) but this department almost drove me away from the University and it certainly steered me into another field.

3) Awful waffle architecture: I've already discussed this briefly in another article, but it's worth mentioning again. Herter, Campus Center Hotel and Garage Tobin... the list goes on and on. Yuck!

4) Calculus 135 and Greek Drama.

5) Collegian computers.

6) Gen-eds in general. Yay, let's force Stacey to take a math class the same close to failing all in the name of diversifying her liberal arts education. Grrr...

7) Sylvan. It scares me that more than half the crime I cover happens in this three-dorm residential area.

8) RAIL. They scare me. Really, they do.

9) The little criminal hooligans that run amuck on this campus. Actually, it's a love/hate relationship. On one hand, they make my job exciting. On the other, they send me hate mail and give me evil looks in the courthouse.

10) Chancellor Scott. Ahhh, there he is. You knew he'd make my list somewhere. Another love/hate relationship. Let's see, where do I begin? We used to be buddies. But then I started writing for the Collegian and I think he hates me. If he doesn't, he sure has an odd way of showing his affection. Like writing a letter correcting a one word misquote — I wrote lesser, he said fewer — distributing it to all the faculty, and trying to humiliate me at a faculty senate meeting so that everyone would think I am a horrid reporter. Umm... one word! I have one word for you: petty.

He did make my job entertaining, however, and I thank him for that. And trying to get past his bodyguard/news director made it that much more challenging. On the one hand, I feel for the guy. He has an awful job juggling student interests and trustee/state pressure. He's also socially awkward. he's a scientist, not a people person. On the other hand, his "vision" for the University is dangerous. Not only would he like to see this campus privatized, he'd like to see it sponsored by corporations. Maybe the science buildings can be sponsored by Mobil; athletic facilities by Nike.

I don't want you to think I'm completely bitter. There are lots of things I love about this Uni. The Collegian, of course. The journalism department. I've been told, "You can't graduate without taking a class with Karen List." Now I know why. Amazing. People's Market bagels with mozzarella and mustard. Yum.

And now, as must happen in any farewell column, I'm gonna get sappy. I'd like to thank some of my sponsors. Julie rocks. So does Lenny. And Julia. Jill will rule the journalism world. Trenkle is my fittle dancing private eye. Jake kills me with his dry wit and dark humor. Rob and Brian and Kevin and Matt and Lisa are cool cool cats. So are Alexis and Gary. Da Trasker is da bomb. Tanya is darling. Frascella is my Davey K protege. Elana is my on- the-scene cohort. Mike, with his phatty gangstah R.I. stah, is one piece of wacky taffy. Casey is acey. Brian McMagnum is my Jonathan Richman divo. Smitty, Seth, Kathleen and Adam are super. You, Saykin, you. Laura is like puddin'. Fugazy is NYC. Vanessa. Theresa and Katie: yeah baby yeeaaaah... oh yeah.

Thanks for putting up with me guys. So long.

Stacey Shackforrrrrd was a wacky Collegian staff member and believes fully that Belle and Sebastian is da bomb.

The way I see it

If there are two things that I am terrible at (just to narrow it down). They are goodbyes and bullshitting, so I don't know what that means for a farewell column full of enlightening advice about what life at UMass has done for me. The kind of advice some of us probably will be hearing in two weeks time about how this is not the end, but the dawn of a whole new life ahead. No, I'll leave that to Rudy Crew (that is if he doesn't get fired by Mayor Giuliani beforehand).

So instead, I'll just do a little reminiscing, a kind of potpourri, if you will. To me, leaving UMass is like the end of an episode of "The Love Boat." Everyone's been through quite a ride and we're each leaving with a different lesson (thank god we don't have the feathered hair and blue eyeshadow, but I do think Capt. Steuben would do a fine job as commencement speaker). The way I see it, not everyone stepping off the boat is happy with the boat ride and how it's turned out, but it's definitely made an impact on the kind of lives we'll lead when we're gone. (I do have an English minor so I might as well work it).

Laura Forster

"We've had a chance to be presidents, poets, producers and hell, I know a few of you are porno stars."

We've had a chance to be presidents, poets, producers and hell, I know a few of you are porno stars. We've protested everything from a changing admissions policy to the preservation of our beer, and I think we've learned that when we truly believe in something we fight for it.

We haven't always taken time to listen to one another ideas before attacking them but at least the ideas were out there for the taking.

So I'm sorry for those of you stepping off who never stopped to open your minds to others, but I'd like to say my thanks to those of you who did voice what you believed in, who understood the whole concept of give and take. Here go the thanks, my apologies to those who don't understand everything...

Thanks first and always to everyone down here in the basement who lost their minds together doing what we love — no strings attached — even when no one understood us. Thanks for letting me be honest even when it hurt, and don't think I'll be losing touch. I wish those of you continuing on the best of luck, I know you'll all do a great job. You've gotten a fair taste of what thankless work really means.

And while I'm at it, bless the Republican Club and their wonderful Minuteman. I want you to know that as much as I think you're producing a sorry piece-of-shit newspaper. I respect your right to say what you want and would never go around trying to analyze what it means when you don't cover certain stories, or throw away your newspapers. Please don't decide to run for office; I think the American people have grown fond of their right to free speech and expression.

Thanks to my parents who have taught me I can do whatever I want as long as I do it with my whole heart and do it well. With that work ethic and the recent news that there's a job opening milking cows for $15/hr., I'll be producing some quality milk!

Thanks to all of my friends, especially those I live with, whom I never kept in touch with well enough this past year since I was busy selling my soul to the Collegian. I'm free now... anyone?

And as the icing on the cake (happy?)... for my love. Thank you for the best night of my life at Mezza Luna, for the laugh and the talks to say the very least, but mind you the night is not over and I will dream.

Everyone else — I hope I didn't come off as preaching. I'm just telling it like I lived it. I want you all to know as news editor I tried my hardest to make the news as thorough, intensive and meaningful as I could. Nine out of 10 times I chose covering a story over doing anything else and I realize I made a lot of mistakes. Just know I lost sleep over my mistakes and I never had biases against which stories were covered. With that said, everyone — meet me at the Motel!!!

Laura Forster is a Collegian staff member and bids the No-tel a fond farewell.

Thank you for reading this daily... and have a great summer.
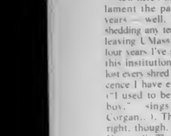
Then tell us about it,
but only if it's dirty.
No, really, tell us about it.
Really.

EDITORIAL / OPINION

The views and opinions expressed on this page are those of the individual writers and do not necessarily represent the views of the Collegian ...



Congratulations, graduating seniors! Make us proud.

Or at least, make us jealous.

The boy with a thorn in his side

Since everything is crashing down at once, I am taking a full 10 minutes out of my life to write this column. As with every article I have ever written, this one will be written with only a few minutes before deadline. So, let me take this opportunity to apologize for every poorly written article that I have put my name on.

Now here's the part where I cry and lament the past four years — well, I'm not shedding any tears over leaving UMass. In the four years I've spent at this institution I have lost every shred of innocence I have ever had ("I used to be a little boy," sings Billy Corgan,). That's all right, though. I quote Hunter S. Thompson: "No sympathy for the devil, keep that in mind. You buy the ticket, you take the ride. And if it occasionally gets a little heavier than what you imagined... well... maybe chalk it up to forced consciousness expansion. Tune in, freak out, get beaten."

Kevin Monahan

True, I will certainly miss those whose friendship I have won and lost, due to a number of things (drugs, loss of contact and just plain stupidity). These past four years have been the best and the worst of my life; those that I will look back on with nostalgia and bitterness. But I will be thrilled to have my entire school career behind me. No grad school for me. I have never been the best student. I can freely admit this fact now.

" I have no plans to "give back" to UMass — even when I do finish paying off all my student loans. Do not ever call me to ask me for any money. "

I must say, one of the things I'll miss most about being a full time student is my job at the Collegian. Among my beloved co-workers that will be missed are Shackford and, of course, Tanya (you're pretty damn cute yourself, baby). Aside from the deadlines, harassing phone calls, hate mail and measly paycheck, I thoroughly enjoyed all the free CDs and free concerts. Being the music editor rocks!

I will miss my old room in Butterfield, my home for three semesters, and all the fun stuff that went on in that time. Most of all, I will miss the commute from Northampton to Amherst, going to class and work and not being home for up to 18 hours at a time.

Wait a minute... I won't miss that at all. And, while I'm at it, I won't miss the nasty people in administration. It seems as though, "I can't help you with that," is all they know how to say, and then take great pleasure in saying it.

Although the good times lighten my spirits, regrets continue to plague me. First of all, attending UMass for all four years of my college career. Why the hell didn't I transfer or go on exchange, or something? Secondly, why did I major in theater? And after realizing that I didn't want to be a theater major, why didn't I change my major? I have a laundry list of regrets that would take up more space than I have allotted, so I won't go any further.

By the way, I got a letter addressed to "graduating senior" asking me to "give back" to UMass. Whoever sent me that letter should know that I have no plans to "give back" to UMass — even when I do finish paying off all my student loans. Do not ever call me to ask me for any money. I don't have any, and even if I did I know that it would not go towards the departments that need it, or that I would like it to go to. I am not donating one cent to the Alumni Fund, so don't even bother asking.

Now I'd like to thank a few professors for dealing with me, among them Dick Trousdell, Jennifer Stone (everyone must take one class with this woman, it's an experience), David Lenson (thanks for enjoying the TMBG review), and a bunch of others too numerous to mention. (Oh, what the hell: Roberta Uno, Harley Erdman, Don Levine and Angel Louriero.)

I want to end this column by saying how much I hate the Fine Arts Center. Yes, I hate that fascist construction designed to minimalize the individual. There are hardly any windows, few points of entry and exit, and it is built to make you feel really small and insignificant. The architect who designed it obviously didn't like people very much. Most of the buildings on this campus are monstrosities, but this one takes the taco.

There are some other random idiocities that I could spout, but this stream of consciousness must come to and end at some point. So goodbye, and good luck. The Collegian must go on without the seniors, so here's a shout out (or a what– what) to everyone keeping it going, and let me know if you ever find out who the coughing guy is.

Kevin Monahan is a Gemini and was the Collegian music editor. He will have to start paying for his CDs now. He still thinks the Barenaked Ladies suck.

Sexy, sweet UMass

I remember sitting on my friend's porch senior year of high school contemplating all the possibilities college held for us: what academic pursuits would we try to achieve, what kinds of extracurricular activities would we engage in, and —

"Do you think I should bring a shower caddy or my poster of Bush? I only have room for one..."

"What if my roommate smells like feet?"

"Do you think anyone in college will find out that my nickname is 'Drooly'?"

As with most UMass students, I couldn't accurately imagine what my life here would be like. My daydreams never included images of parking tickets, pizza crusts, communal showers, or classes that existed on my schedule, but not in my actual life. During orientation I imagined myself sitting quietly by the swan-graced pond reflecting on deep issues. Well, yesterday I sat down at a bench next to the pond and there was a dead duck right in front of me and I had stepped in poo.

Lot's of times at UMass I have stepped in the proverbial "poo." I've failed a sociology class, I've made friends and lost friends, I've eaten too many calzones and smoked too many cigarettes. I've lived with a 56-year-old doctoral student with emotional problems. I've even applied to transfer — twice. But I didn't know all that poo was really fool's gold (sorry, this is getting gross). It's all so zen really, all the bad stuff had meaning and goodness. You just never know what you got till it's gone.

I have learned so much from so many different kinds of people. Oy vey, I'm sorry, but I have to do this.

Len — thanks for giving me nicotine and your great sense of humor; I'll take you to Caldor anytime, baby! Jamie — I'm glad Leigh, Cheri and Paula, our hot ladies, will be in heaven together, you are the best Spice Girl! To the man of the house — you can wear a dirty wife–beater like no other; and Elsa — we will always have Sicily and you, my friend, can always get a what–what from me. Oh Phillips Street, you've been good to me.

Julie Fialkow

And of course, the end all to the be all, I'd like to give out some Collegian lovin'. My Psychic Friend: I am so glad to meet someone who knows how to kick the funk around! I have learned so much from your intelligence and perseverance — and how to give the finger to sketchy men in pick-up trucks, Smackford: frankly scallop, I don't give a clam, you know what else? Heaven has a name and her name is Spacey Smackford. You are the cutest, that is all I can say. Tanya: I will always bring the few to you. Rompi— you are one crazy cannoli. KC: you make me laugh, sometimes, I admit, until I wet myself.

Lisa: thanks for keepin' it real yo! I've learned a thing or two about McDonald's hamburgers and graphics from you. Danny: you are the sassiest Lawng Island babe I know. Julia Gulia: not only are you stylish, you also are sweet as sugar. I really do think it is empowering to spill stuff on your shirt, just ask Laura. Mattress Cowboy: your life is all about fecal matter, and yet I still love being your friend.

Macaroni n' Cheese–McDermott: all I have to say is: like red, red wine, you keep me rockin' all of the time. If I'm plucky, it's only cause you give me something to be plucky about. You bring me so much joy and laughter. To a toothless star: when we see the Phanatic this summer, I hope you can contain your hormones. Lord help me, even though you want to cut me, I'll always think you're duper than dope. There's nobody else I'd rather argue about music videos with at 3 a.m. (except maybe Simon Birch).

To the classiest ladies workin' it at the No–tell Motel: Laura, how many people will still be your friend after they crash you into cars and then sleep at your house and drink all your liquor? You are one of the warmest people I've ever met. I'll eat soup chicken with you any day. Rainy– rain, thank you for making my sorry–ass get off your couch and have good times on many an occasion. Thank you for listening. Thank you for meeping and making me margaritas. Thank you both for spreading your positivity like it was the flu. You girls are the finest mamas ever!

Goodbye sweet UMass! You will always be in my heart, and my money will always be in your hands. You make being a below average, overpriced state school very sexy. Thank you.

Last call!

I grew up next to another UMass, the one in Dartmouth. According to local legend, a Satanist had designed it, and from an aerial view you could see swirls of sixes in the parking lots. I used to look at the "space age" construction of crumbling cement and think, "God, that's ugly."

My mother, eternal optimist, thought of it as ancient and modern at the same time. She shivered at the sight of Bryn Mawr, for instance — "spooky" with its dark, gothic design. "UMass is fresh but not new: comfortable. You don't have the smothering weight of tradition," she said.

When I came to UMass Amherst, I thought a few things here had been designed by the devil himself: the bathrooms, the Fine Arts Center. And I thought of selling my soul to him, just to get away from Amherst.

That was freshman year, during a minor identity crisis (one of many). Yeah, I joined the Women's Crew Team, for my 15 minutes of being a jock. I was a novice in every sense of the word — and I hate exercise. But could I have met that strong, focused group of women and actually practiced with them on the water at a small, private school? Don't bet on it. That was a real privilege.

It was one of many opportunities that came easily here. I remember a girl on Rikki Lake (saw it live): "My momma always said, the squeaky girl gets the grease. And I'm a real squeaky girl..."

You have to seek out these things: be squeaky as a squeak toy. It's the lesser–known continuation of Woody Allen's famous line: "Ninety–nine percent of success is showing up."

I showed up at a meeting for the Distinguished Visitors Program, and eventually helped bring Ginsberg and the Bell Curve Debate to campus. I showed up at an info–session about studying abroad. These things pay off.

One of the best pieces of advice given to me when I went to Oxford: get drunk with the Brits. I couldn't agree more. After puking up copiously all over our communal hallway, they treated me with respect... or was it fear? In any case, it was the start of many drinking episodes at the Bull & Pen, the Cock & Bull, the Scotch & Poodle, and the Pig & Gin.

Tanya Mannes

Studying on exchange rocks. Backpacking around Europe rocks too — I'll never forget sleeping on a rocky beach in Nice, getting sprayed by the street cleaners with my backpacking buddy, Jody. I'll never forget the roller coaster on the top of a mountain, Tibidabo, overlooking Barcelona. I'll also never forget how my little Oxford dorm room smelled, and how I finally realized it was the sandals I'd worn in the showers at Bob's Youth Hostel in Amsterdam.

I came back, and what was left to do? Slurp coffee at Haymarket; drink Famous Grouse; see free acoustic at Fire and Water; submit a few sophomoric articles to the Collegian. Hey, you've gotta start somewhere.

Next year (thanks, Mike), I got to join the Collegian staff and regret having waited so long to meet such a charming, literate group of people. A few of my favorite staff members: brilliant white Trask, adorable Monahan, wacky "cherry cola" Julie, pragmatic Alexis, Dr. Gary, and Trenklebell.

Meanwhile, my best friend Bren had returned from studying abroad, and we set up shop in Amherst. We shared epiphanies, often regarding Mumia, Machiavelli or Margaret Atwood. Together, we experienced lost love and Las Vegas.

I know now that where we lack traditions at UMass, we invent them. We make toasts. We pass along advice. We create a "Collegian house."

I had always wanted to lose myself in the anonymity of a big school. Being swept up in the chaos has been exhilarating, and finding a niche more so. I have been able to make friends, travel a bit, and learn the difference between modern, post–modern and "post."

I cannot wait to teach in Japan next year with my darling Kenneth, and learn more about Yakult, sake and animation.

UMass, ha!

I have learned a lot in college. And not just the essentials, like keg tapping 101, or Dining Commons stealing 350 (in which I have an "A") — I have mastered all of these things here at UMass in two short years, and now it's time to move on. While most of my friends here are getting their caps and gowns, talking about jobs and apartments, I too am leaving, but not graduating.

Most of my Collegian pals and I are trying to get as far away from this place as possible, because after so much time in the basement we need jobs in buildings with windows. Fresh air and sun are key. Being down here, seasons can change, world events can happen and classes — well, they just go right on schedule. Ah, classes... those posters they put up about how much it costs to skip class, they just don't do the trick. This place is addictive.

But alas, my time is up. As most of us will realize sooner or later its time to go. That's fine by me. UMass is a great school... sort of. It's a school that loves its administration, not its students. Frankly, its not even necessary to invest a Whitmore joke. Everybody hates Whitmore; it's one of those things your RA tells you at the first floor meeting. The administration at UMass doesn't live by the saying: "You can't please all the people all of the time." Instead they just try and screw you every which way.

"Most of my Collegian pals and I are trying to get as far away from this place as possible, because after so much time in the basement we need jobs in buildings with windows."

Joseph D Savitch

You want to graduate in four years, ha! You want to change your major, ha! You want to feel that your voice matters to the people in charge, ha! UMass just doesn't care and that's too bad. I have seen how other schools treat students — as people, not numbers.

A perfect utopia — not here at UMass. And speaking of perfect utopia's dorm living, nothing could be finer. Living in Orchard Hill I never experienced tower wars, or the Northeast streak. But Orchard Hill, the "quiet" dorm complex, has its own tradition — bowl wars. Ah, Trenkle, why must you scream at the top of your lungs: "Grayson !@#$?" It just doesn't solve anything. But he does and so do countless other people all night. So this perception all around campus that Orchard Hill is the quiet, preppy area is dead wrong.

Dorm living was fun for two years but I never want to do it again, ever. Like most people on campus I can't wait for my own space with my own rules. And frankly, having to use a public bathroom (even though I have my own stall), just doesn't cut it. Sure, you get used to it, but frankly listening to somebody else grunt and groan just wasn't my idea of fun in the morning.

But college isn't just about dorms, classes and an administration that doesn't care, its about learning. And useful, practical learning happens outside the classroom more often than sitting listening to someone theorize about the way it could be. And that's where this place comes in.

When I got here I had no idea what I wanted to do with my life, but the Collegian has shown me the way. So I urge everyone who is interested in some field to go work there. Don't just read about it. Also find someone who cares about your learning and who will show you things; for me it was our graphics advisor, Thom Sweeney. He may have had an abrasive personality, but underneath all of his ranting and raving, he cared about students and showed me things I wouldn't have learned anywhere else.

The Collegian has been a great place, the friends and the life experiences, I will never forget. But alas — I can't get a degree in the Daily Collegian. If I could, there would be no need for this column. I will miss this place more than anything else on campus.

Joseph D. Savitch is a Collegian staff member with one hell of a beard.

It takes a tough man to make a tender chicken. It takes great columnists to make a great Collegian.

New procedure stops disease from being passed down

CHICAGO (AP) — Parents who carry the gene for sickle cell anemia can now ensure their children will be free of the disease by using test-tube fertilization and having the embryos genetically analyzed before they are implanted.

The procedure allows parents to use an embryo free of the devastating gene, guaranteeing they will not pass on the disease. Without the genetic diagnosis, children of two sickle cell carriers have a 25 percent chance of developing the disease and a 50 percent chance of being a carrier.

The technique is already used to prevent other hereditary disorders such as cystic fibrosis and Tay-Sachs disease.

It was successfully applied to sickle cell carriers for the first time last year. Two embryos screened through the process are now healthy twins free of sickle cell disease and the gene defect that causes it, according to researchers.

They reported their findings in today's Journal of the American Medical Association.

Previously, parents who were sickle cell carriers had to wait until 10 weeks into pregnancy for a test to indicate whether their fetus inherited the defect and would develop sickle cell anemia. The disease can be passed on only if both parents are carriers.

"Up to now, couples who had affected fetuses could only deal with it by having an induced abortion," said Dr. Zev Rosenwaks, the study's principal investigator. Rosenwaks directs the Center for Reproductive Medicine and Infertility at Cornell University's Weill Medical College, which collaborated with Dr. Mark Hughes of Wayne State University in Detroit on developing the test.

Sickle cell anemia, which mostly affects blacks, is one of the most common inherited genetic disorders. One in 625 black children is afflicted.

The life-shortening disease results from an abnormality in hemoglobin, the oxygen-carrying pigment in blood. The defect distorts red cells into the shape of sickles.

Symptoms start as early as six months after birth and include fatigue, headaches, organ damage, seizures and strokes. Sickle cell anemia also increases a person's vulnerability to infections. No cure has been found.

The technique the researchers used is called pre-implantation genetic diagnosis, or PGD. It allows researchers to study genetic traits in embryos even when they are made up of only six to eight cells.

The procedure has been used for about 10 years in parents with gene traits for similarly inherited disorders, such as cystic fibrosis, Tay-Sachs disease and thalassemia, which also involves hemoglobin.

"We've done at least 12 different diseases," said Dr. Charles M. Strom, medical director of the Reproductive Genetics Institute at Illinois Masonic Hospital in Chicago. He was not involved in this study.

Strom said his institute also used PGD to prevent sickle cell disease in a baby born last October.

The technique is expensive and performed at only a few medical facilities. In vitro fertilization costs $8,000 to $12,000 per attempt, and the PGD test is $2,000.

Dr. Oswaldo Castro, director of the Sickle Cell Disease Center at Howard University in Washington, said he is opposed to using PGD to select embryos because it means other embryos are passed over. Some are destroyed, and others are frozen for possible future implantation.

"As I treat a lot of patients with sickle cell, it's difficult for me to put a judgment. Well, this one should never have been born," Castro said.

Flag burning amendment not catching fire

WASHINGTON (AP) - Backers of a proposed constitutional amendment to ban flag burning said yesterday the decision of two wavering Democratic senators to oppose it has dampened its prospects.

North Dakota Democrats Byron Dorgan and Kent Conrad raised proponents' hopes this year by retreating from their opposition to the amendment and declaring themselves undecided. The amendments' supporters began to consider them two of three additional Senate votes needed to cross the required two-thirds threshold.

Republican Senate leaders aim for a floor vote before Memorial Day. Dorgan and Conrad announced they would vote against amending the Constitution and offer a long-shot alternative that would ban flag desecration in a statute instead.

"A number of constitutional scholars have convinced me a statute can still be upheld by the Supreme Court," said Dorgan. The court has twice declared flag-burning laws unconstitutional abridgments of free speech.

The senators' decision "hurts the situation," Judiciary Committee Chairman Orrin Hatch, R-Utah, said. "It makes passage less likely." But Hatch said the amendment still would be brought to the floor.

Industrial dance rockers KMFDM say "Adios"

COURTESY KAREN MOSKOWITZ

Adios is KMFDM's final album.

By Kevin Monahan

ADIOS
KMFDM
Wax Trax!/TVT

It is so appropriate that this is the last CD review of the semester. Adios, the 10th and final album from electro- industrial demons KMFDM, surely brings about the end of a legacy.

This band has gotten a bad rep as of late. So, let me start out by saying that this album is unlikely to inspire one to go on a rampage, the last thing this band needs is shit like that. In fact, it is unlikely to inspire one to do anything.

Aside from their last album, Adios is also KMFDM's most unremarkable album. For the most part, the album seems less of a collaborative effort, and more of a ping-pong match between founder Sascha Konietzko and Tim Skold.

There are more pummel-in-your-head techno beats than there are crashing guitars here. Adios serves mostly as a transition piece between the death of KMFDM and their bastardized incarnation as MDFMK (minus drummer En Esch). Actually En Esch and guitarist Gunter Schultz are given little to do.

The hardcore electronics start with the title track "Adios." "Sycophant" seems to be Skold's attempt at being self- referential. "D.I.Y." is an above average cut, but the track that redeems this album is the pop brilliance of "Today." Try to imagine KMFDM paying homage to Depeche Mode and you kind-of get the idea. "Witness," a song about alien abduction, is also one of the stronger tracks thanks to avant-garde punker Nina Hagen's vocals. Skinny Puppy's Ogre makes much welcome appearances on "That's All" and "Full Worm Garden." Also assisting on "Full Worm Garden" is Bill Rieflin (Ministry, Revolting Cocks).

Things transgress to mediocre with tracks like "R.U. OK?" and "Rubicon." The very German sounding "Bereit" closes the album not quite with the bang that we would expect of KMFDM's final album. If Adios is meant to be KMFDM's grand finale, it should have been more grand.

Adios is an album that could drive the hardcore KMFDM fan to tears. Not just because the band has ceased to exist in its well-known form, but because their final effort strayed so far away from what make albums like Nihil, Xtort and Money and songs like "Godlike/Doglike" and "Juke Joint Jezebel" so great. Despite the fact that Adios didn't measure up to its expectations, there are a few tracks that let us know why this band was so loved. R.I.P., KMFDM. B-

Klein and Percy Hill play Iron Horse

Percy Hill will be performing with Jess Klein at the Iron Horse.

By Tom Sadlowski
Collegian Staff

The Iron Horse hosts two inspiring shows tomorrow night, which showcase a pair of great emerging artists. Singer-songwriter Jess Klein, nominated for two awards at last month's Boston Music Awards, opens the evening in the early show, with groove rocker Percy Hill jamming away the night.

Klein's extensive touring of the New England area has allowed her to perform with such artists as Ani DiFranco, the Neilds and Moxy Fruvous. She headed up the Voices on The Verge tour that was able to sell out clubs throughout all the major cities in the Northeast. Her appealing songs have been released on the Respond Compilation and the second volume of This is Boston Not Austin.

Her powerful vocals are the driving force behind her debut album, Wishes Well Disguised. The album serves as an intense look at Klein's songwriting abilities. Softness is encompassed on "the Cloud Song," while "Solid Ground" offers a delightful chorus melody and "Romeo" is striking. Klein's love of a cappella from her college days concludes the album with "Another Man Done Gone."

Percy Hill looks to get the crowd dancing with their four- part harmonies and great blend of music genres. They have been steadily transforming the music world.

The band's latest effort, Color in Bloom, explores light sounds and skillful transitions. Upon first playing of the band's album, the first track, "Slave," highlights the band's uplifting melodies. "Chrissy Reid" offers the excitement that the band performs with, while "Sun Machine" gracefully redefines itself into a pleasurable experience.

Jess Klein and her band perform this Thursday at 7 p.m. with Peter Mulvey. Percy Hill's showtime is set to begin at 10 p.m. Tickets for both shows may be purchased at the Northampton Box Office or by calling 1-800-THE-IRON.

Student movie to screen tomorrow

By Bryan McAllister
Collegian Staff

At 1 p.m. on a beautiful, paradise-like Monday afternoon, senior communications major Josh Splansky sits in the basement of the Student Union Building, enclosed in small, dusty UVC TV–19 room. He spends endless hours sitting at a computer screen, playing and replaying videotape and initiating requests into the computer. The night before, he worked till 3 a.m., and plans to work even more in the next couple of days.

Such are the habits of an editor — Splansky is in the final stages of production on Passed Tense, a video movie he wrote, directed and produced. The movie will screen tomorrow night, at 8 p.m. in Campus Center room 163C. The event is free.

Featuring a cast of six leads, Passed Tense is the story of a group of friends who reunite just before the end of college, prompted by one of the friends finding a videotape of them all hanging out freshman year. In reuniting, the friends find out exactly how much they've changed and how much has remained the same.

"I wanted something that was easy to produce, something Breakfast Club-like," said Splansky, who is also the president of UVC TV–19. "[In that], there's five people in one room, pretty much the entire time. I wanted college- aged students, and I didn't want to be outside... my original idea was to have [the friends] all in a recreation room most of the time... but I felt the characters were getting stir crazy, so they go get pizza, go dancing... but a good half of the movie is in the rec room."

Splansky came up with the story with his old high school friend A. David Lewis, and wrote the 86-page screenplay from those ideas as part of his senior honors project through Professor Norden in the Communication department.

Passed Tense began shooting in January and finished most of its main production in the beginning of March. The movie was shot in Cashin Hall, Miss Florence Diner in Northampton, many apartment houses, Club Metro, Bell's Pizza, Victory Plaza, outside Video to Go, and in the UVC TV–19 studio.

After shooting, Splansky spent the past month editing on UVC's brand new digital editing system, which allows him to cut and paste scenes with the ease of a word processor.

Seeing about 35 minutes of the finished product was a unique experience. The production looks significantly better than usual student productions, and the flow and timing, when not hampered by editing constraints, was well done. UMass students should also look for some solid acting by Colin Metz, Erin Hillier, Jennifer Lake, Derrick DeMaio, Amanda Ashe and Kevin Kelliher.

The assistant director for the production is Bethany Daniels. The artistic director is Amy Carroll.

Smoking Gun Productions will be presenting Barrymore's Ghost and Still House (an original one act) in the Rand Theater Tomorrow at 8 p.m. There is a suggested donation of $3.

Bankhead reflects on life

Quarterback Todd Bankhead has overcome the tragic death of his father to cancer and a badly scarred football tradition here at UMass...

By Farrah Alexander
Collegian Correspondent

Massachusetts football quarterback Todd Bankhead has proven he can win battles both on and off the gridiron. Having completed only his first season as quarterback for the Minutemen, he has helped lead his team out of a 2–9 slump and already has a national championship title to his credit.

In his first season, Bankhead established new single season records for touchdowns, completions, passing yards, attempts and total offense (3,756 yards), and now possesses four out of five of the top five passing games in UMass history (a result of his four 300-yard performances).

But Bankhead, who is unpretentious attributes the Minutemen's victory to teamwork, and credits his teammates for the team's success.

"One of the things I recognized at first was that the team here has some great guys, guys that are real unselfish, guys that were just wanting to win," said Bankhead.

"I've never really been on a team that was so dedicated and hard working and desiring to win as much as they did, so that really motivated me to go out and perform for those guys."

In addition to his physical strength, Bankhead demonstrates strength of character. The southern California native arrived on campus only months after losing his father to cancer. His father had been a main supporter throughout his career.

"Since I was a kid, he was always at all my games, and doing whatever it took to get me where I wanted to be and [he] was always real supportive. I wish he could be here to see what we've accomplished and what we went through last year, it was so much fun," said Bankhead.

Once at UMass, he not only had to become acclimated to the East Coast rather quickly, but had to focus on playing football, concentrate on his academics, and cope with his family's loss all at the same time. Although it was "tough," he says he was concerned less with how he was coping than with how his family was struggling with the news.

Still Bankhead managed to remain optimistic, crediting his decision to come to UMass as a blessing in disguise.

"Coming out here [UMass] has helped me because it's kind of taken my mind off of things, and I've had to move on with my life. God blessed me with the tremendous opportunity to play for a great coach and to come in and be able to compete for a starting job."

Of course, it was beyond any of Bankhead's wildest dreams to win a national championship.

"Playing at UMass was also a real blessing because my family got real excited about last season, [winning the championship], I was just really happy that they could take their mind off of it too," said Bankhead.

On top of everything, he remained focused on the goals of the team. "I just came in here with the mindset that I was going to do all I could to help out, and before the season I worked as hard as I could to put my team in a position to win and be successful."

While Bankhead is enjoying his team's status as the 1998 national champions, the same fortitude and discipline that kept him focused on his performance last year, despite his ordeal, has already got him contemplating about the coming season.

"Just as we were an 8–3 team during the regular season, I think we could have easily been a 6–5 team if things hadn't gone our way, so that just shows you how hard we need to work to get that much better to insure another successful season," said Bankhead. "[Last season] the teams we played in our conference gave us all we could handle, and I know it's going to be magnified ten times next year.

"We're just going to have to have the mindset that no one can stop us except ourselves — so we've just got to go out and do it."

duced success."

The Minutewomen will now have to set their sights on Sept. 1. That will be the day when UMass travels to Albany to face the University of Albeny in the 1999 season opener.

"It's sort of a shame that we have to end now because it's been going good. One of the most encouraging things was that we only allowed two goals [outside]. Our defense has really come around, and that was a problem for us last fall," Rudy said. "Plus both our keepers, Angie [Napoli] and Cori [Stevens] had a very good spring. I can't wait until next fall to get going again."

Overall, the Minutewomen seem to be heading back in the right direction for the 1999 season, and should once again return to their perch atop of the Atlantic 10 Conference.

Minutewomen Notes: UMass had their annual awards banquet on Saturday afternoon, recognizing the individual achievements from the 1998 squad. The awards, as voted by the players went to — Cook (outstanding newcomer), Kristi Rubicheau (hustle award), Anna Morozuk (most improved), Garcesu (unsung hero) and Emma Kurowski and Amanda Thompson (team MVP's).

right, is the best waiter Rafters (ah, Rafters, I wouldn't have made it through here without you) has ever seen. You two guys deserve more attention and recognition than I can give you here. I'm sure glad I met ya.

I have met tremendous people: Matty; Juice; B.P.; Candice; Steve Cohen; Chewy; Alexis; Lisa Oliveri; Leigh Faulkner; Liz Brown; Tanya; Alexis; Gary; Trasker; Bryan; Rob; Kevin; Lenny; Julia; Rob "Fifi" Snow; Joylyn Lombard; D.J. "Fifi" Carey; Parm; Teresa; Joe; Voldan. Thom; Marty; Maureen. There are too many more to mention.

But I'll try. So here are a few lengthier shout-outs. Paul: I love you. I'm glad you got you ass in gear and got down here. It paid off. I'll always remember hangin' in Philly with ya (how could I forget Mr. Darryl?). Good luck, kid. Smitty and Mauser: You two are clowns, but the sports department is lucky to have you. Thank you for everything Frascella, Saykin, Kathleen, Seth, Tory, Murph, Mike Doyle and everyone else. Big Daddy, I sure will miss you. I mean that.

Julie, Jill, Lorraine, Laura, Trenkle, Stacey, McDermott, Dani and Jake, I'm so proud of the job you guys have done putting up with shit. Wear your time here as a badge of pride. It'll treasure the time I've spent with you.

Finally, Scoop. You, sir, are amazing. Without a doubt you have impressed me more and more every day. At this time last year, you were still green. My respect for you is through the roof. I mean that. Without a doubt, you have impressed me. Without a doubt, you will be a success in life. I just hope you don't forget about me. God knows I couldn't forget about you (even if I tried). I'm damn proud of you. I love you, kid.

was able to keep most of us nuts in some type of check. To Seth Koenig and Justin Rudd and WMUA for letting us pile into their room (wink, wink). And, of course, that really beautiful waitress that I slipped my number to in Penn. Oh yeah, and finally Kobo, who did a great job sleeping in the back of the car and writing a sidebar on the game.

I would like to thank the men's hockey team and the fans who supported them — both of you did a great job making UMass proud.

I would like to thank coach Joe Mallen, for being a class act and being a great coach to work with. Coach, that gesture to the fans at the last home game was classy.

To Markus Helanen and Toni Soderholm, great job boys and we'll expect even better things next season from the Finnish connection. To all the Canadians on the team, I would just like to say, absolutely a fabulous job, for sure, ey.

And to the guys from the USA, tell your friends from the Boston area to come and play at UMass, we need some snipers. But honestly, the hockey team deserves tremendous credit and your support next year, so again great job boys and that was quite the banquet.

The UMass Minutewomen's lacrosse team did a great job with what they were given this season. The Minutewomen had several injuries and players missing games due to family matters and a coach who was pregnant, and other random problems like the officiating in Philadelphia, but they overcame and went 9-6 and lost to Va. Tech in the semifinals of the A-10 tourney this season.

I would like to thank Francesca McClellan for putting up with my stories and for helping me do the best I could with a sport that I was learning as I was watching. Thanks for the candidness coach, I always appreciated it.

As far as the players, you ladies did a great job hanging in there this year. Laura Korutz way to finish on a high note in Philadelphia. The senior scored four goals and had an assist as well.

Melissa Anderson great job throughout, no one can handle that midfield like you. To Lynne Young, Denise Brey and Jessica Passanese great job holding teams down back there on D. You guys kept some of the highest scoring teams in the nation to seven or eight goals, way-to-be!

Some of the defensive credit has to go to Jen Nardi, phenomenal job in the cage. To Ingraffea, Gorski, MacNabb and Pavlick, solid and consistent job this year for all. To Kara DePaula, Pam Neale, Katie Carey Eileen Currier, McKeon, Christy Ambrose and Tara Durkin, good job by all of giving this team the midseason spark that they needed.

To Rebecca Minaker and Melissa Miele, who can each be described as two of the nicest people I ever had the pleasure of covering and talking to. They did a stupendous job this season. Minaker tallied 16 points this season, while Miele averaged two goals per game for a while there, before slowing down to one goal a game. Great job ladies.

Just like to remember Michigan State, Syracuse and Ohio. Would like to say what's up to my second home in Philly and Jim's Philly Cheese Steaks. Chattanooga where the football team gave me a national championship on my birthday, December 19.

To Eric Sopracasa, you will not be forgotten and the UMass sports family will always remember you. In the words of the immortal Pink Floyd: "Wish you were here." You are immortal in the eyes of UMass sports, kid. Thanks for the memories.

I would like to give a shout out to all the people who made my stay at UMass the best it could be. This includes my roommates after I got off campus; Seth Koenig, Eric Merrifield, Ryan Cameron, Lawrence Redford and Tony Canova.

I would like to give out props to Danielle Henderson, the women's volleyball team and Bonnie Kenny, best of luck next year, and water polo for another great season, good job!

To all the girls who made it a great four years. Thanks! I'll never forget you, and finally I would just like to give a shout out to all my favorite bars like Mike's Westview.

When the dust clears and I sit back and relax and look back at my college career I would just like to be able to say, "I worked as hard as I could while I was stuck in this place. Played as hard as I could while I was stuck in this place. Dogged as many chicks as I could while I was stuck in this place." Thank you UMass and thanks to my Collegian family for making it fun. Peace out.

I would also like to say "What's up" to Sinitty for letting me borrow his car and for almost hooking up with my female roommate. Damn thing broke down on us in Philly.

Paul Tevys was a Collegian columnist and doesn't like Socialists.

TAURUS (April 20–May 20) — It may be up to you today to corral the efforts of those around you and focus everyone's attention on one single essential objective. Need a project: plan a barbecue.

GEMINI (May 21–June 20) — Look back at your most recent success and ask yourself what made it possible. Today, the answer will point you in the right direction. Like the North Star.

CANCER (June 21–July 22) — Now is the time for you to make amends with someone you've had a strained relationship with for some time. Compromise, because it's no one's fault. And if it is someone's fault, it's probably yours.

LEO (July 23–Aug. 22) — You may be able to make one or two surprising and remarkable claims today. Stand behind them 100 percent. The sky's the limit! Claim you're graduating. Bonus points if people believe it.

VIRGO (Aug. 23–Sept. 22) — You may be getting quite close to a major goal today, but before it is within your reach, you're going to have to deal with a major distraction. Like parties. Lots of 'em.

LIBRA (Sept. 23–Oct. 22) — You may have to carry more than your share of the weight today, but you can surely do it, especially if it means giving a friend a helping hand. And especially if you are your Wheaties.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23–Nov. 21) — You're going to want to get someone interested in you today, and it's not likely to be easy. Turn on the charm, but also be ready to think! And then get ready to undress.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22–Dec. 21) — Your schedule is likely to pick up considerably today, and the word for a manageable pace is absolute. Don't lose control! Ah, hell, lose control.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22–Jan. 19) — Short-term endeavors are favored today, but you needn't set aside that long-term project altogether. Reach for what is attainable. In other words, put off till tomorrow what you can do today.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20–Feb. 18) — What appears "out of the blue" today may prove to be dangerous, and you'll want to be well-equipped to deal with any related crisis. Buy socks and beef jerkey. They'll help in a crisis.

PISCES (Feb. 19–March 20) — This can be a highly fulfilling day, particularly when you are dealing with youngsters. You can learn just as much as you teach today. But you can't teach an old dog new tricks. Remember this.

ARIES (March 21–April 19) — You may be able to take something quite conventional and raise the stakes considerably, turning it into something new and exciting. Like recycling. Or poker. Whatever.

Appell's grand finale: 76ers take home 3 awards

The playoffs are underway in full force, but there is still the small matter of post-season awards at hand. After Michael Jordan thankfully retired, he left other players the opportunity to become darlings of the referees and thus win over the voting committee. There will be no such favoritism played here, as I not only pronounce the winners but pen my final Collegian NBA column as well.

Sanford Appel on the NBA

Most Valuable Player Allen Iverson, Philadelphia 76ers — After sulking in his own immaturity for years, Iverson finally got his act in gear, leading the Sixers to the playoffs for the first time since 1991. After moving to the two guard, Iverson was able to concentrate his currently unparalleled offensive abilities, winning his first scoring title (28.8 ppg). He also contributed with 4.6 assists and 4.9 rebounds per game, considerably high for a 6-foot-1 shooting guard. Kudos to Allen.

1st Runner-up: Karl Malone, Utah Jazz 2nd Runner-up: Tim Duncan, San Antonio Spurs.

It's hard for anyone to admit, but Malone is flat-out the best big man in the game. He simply delivers, rain or shine, hence the ridiculed "Mailman" moniker. Duncan is quickly developing into the most versatile post-man in the league, the title David Robinson used to hold.

Rookie of the Year Vince Carter, Toronto Raptors

As Rick Pitino might say, "a no-brainer." The North Carolina product near single-handedly reversed the entire outlook for the Raptor franchise since entering the league, the Raptors have been a laughingstock not worthy of ESPN's precious time. This year, Carter's 18.3 points and 5.7 boards as a rook speak for themselves.

1st runner-up: Jason Williams, Sacramento Kings. 2nd runner-up: Paul Pierce, Boston Celtics.

Williams, the flashy point guard from Florida guided the raw Kings to the playoffs, huff said. Pierce was the dark front-runner but fizzled midway through the season before finishing strong. A solid pro for the future, undoubtedly.

Coach of the Year Larry Brown, Philadelphia 76ers — Don't give Iverson all of the credit for the Philly revitalization. Brown, a coach who has simply won wherever he's gone it up to his old tricks again. Namely taking a team with mediocre talent at best after Iverson, and making them conference finals contenders. This year's miracle job improves Brown's professional mark to 912-660.

In a year where the Lakers were runaway favorites to claim yet another Pacific Division title, Dunleavy coached the Blazers to their first such achievement since the '91-'92 campaign. In the process, he was forced to mesh some very difficult personalities and convince them to play in harmony. His substitution patterns were nothing short of brilliant. Silas took over a 1-11 Hornets squad, and somehow managed an above .500 season at 26-24.

Sixth Man of the Year Darrell Armstrong, Orlando Magic — Without a doubt the fiercest sparkplug in the league this year. His production off the pine forced Penny Hardaway and Nick Anderson to better themselves to save face. Armstrong's 15.8 points per game were impressive enough, but he also finished 12th in the NBA in assists (6.7), and 3rd in free throw percentage (.904).

1st runner-up: Rasheed Wallace, Portland Trailblazers. 2nd runner-up: Jalen Rose, Indiana Pacers.

Wallace became uncharacteristicly cooperative and therefore productive off the bench. He posted 12.7 points and grabbed 5.0 rebounds in vastly reduced minutes. Rose has quietly become one of the most dangerous weapons in Indiana's arsenal.

Most Improved Player Eric Snow, Philadelphia 76ers —

This is getting a little repetitive, but I have no preference towards the Sixers at all. Snow was bounced out of Seattle by a hasty George Karl, but was superb as the floor general this season. His numbers shot up from 3.3 to 8.6 in points, and 2.8 to 6.3 in assists since last year. His capabilities allowed Iverson to become the player he now is.

Runner-up: Sanford Appell, University of Massachusetts — Tough start out of the gate freshman year. Great on a little low, social concept distorted, but met a nice girl and joined the Collegian team and the rest is history.

Thanks for reading and hopefully enjoying the column, best of luck to all.

Sanford Appell is a Collegian columnist.

UM lax endures sour year

By Sanford Appell
Collegian Staff

Sometimes sports encompasses more than winning and losing. The Massachusetts men's lacrosse team learned that the hardest way of all last Wednesday when junior defenseman Eric Sopracasa passed away after a freak accident during practice.

A season of growing pains on the field will be forever overshadowed by the traumatic and ultimately tragic occurrence that transpired on the practice fields before the season finale at Brown.

However anyone associated with the team should choose not only to honor the memory of Sopracasa, an invaluable member to the defensive unit, but to recognize the tremendous effort the squad put forth this season.

Despite a disappointing 4-8 mark, the Minutemen proved consistently that they could compete with the best teams in the nation on a game by game basis.

Entering the 1998 campaign, UMass included a whopping 27 underclassmen (10 freshmen, 17 sophomores), but Massachusetts coach Greg Cannella looked forward to pivotal matchups with powerhouses Loyola, Virginia, Duke and Syracuse anyway.

He said at the time that taking on the upper echelon of the college lacrosse world would prove to be beneficial down the line because of the experience to be gained.

While the team was not an immediately cohesive unit in 1998, UMass did get out to a solid 2-1 start, including wins over local foes Holy Cross and Fairfield.

The Minutemen got stellar production from some of the underclassmen early, including a three-goal, two-assist output from John Madigan in the Holy Cross triumph.

Madigan would go on to lead the team in scoring outright, compiling 51 points on 20 goals and 11 assists.

He was trailed only slightly by fellow second year-star Rich Kunkel, who notched 22 goals to compliment seven assists.

The Minutemen fell out of tournament contention dropping five of their next six contests, after the positive start.

The most competitive defeat in that stretch was a heartbreaking 8-7 defeat at the hands of arch-rival Hofstra.

UMass squandered a 7-6 fourth-quarter edge, and committed an unforced error on their last possession leading to the long ride home from Hempstead.

After pummelling Bay State nemesis Boston College, 17-7, at Richard F. Garber Field on March 30, the Minutemen embarked on their toughest grind of the year.

Faced with a consecutive three-game line-up of No. 19 Butler, No. 2 Duke and No. 1 Loyola, Cannella knew his players would need to mature in rapid fashion.

Resiliently, the Minutemen answered the challenge from the moment the ball was dropped against the Bulldogs, eventually succumbing to Butler, 9-7.

The follow-up was a closer than the score indicated, a 13- 8 loss at Duke. The game was a tribute to how far the young core had come in a short period of time.

The finale of the three-game set was a 9-5 Loyola victory, but it was the first time the best team in the nation had been held to under 10 goals for the season.

Sophomore goalkeeper Chris Campulettano fully established his prowess with that showing.

In his initial year as starter, Campulettano saved 388 shots, while allowing 87 goals, logging 649 minutes.

That performance solidified his standing with the coaches and defense as a whole, after he stepped into the esteemed role that John Kasselakis held before him.

The Minutemen moved on to split a pair of matches with Harvard and Notre Dame, winning the former for their lone road victory.

On Senior Night, UMass took on its eighth ranked opponent of the season in the Syracuse Orangemen.

A valiant 8-6 loss to the No. 5 ranked squad was marred by UMass fans tossing oranges at the opposing players.

Nonetheless, the players established in front of the largest turnout of the year that they would back down from no one and remain competitive with everyone.

In the final joint act of the season, the players voted late last week to forego their final match against Brown, to properly pay their respects to Sopracasa.

UM soccer enjoys solid spring

By Michael Kobylanski
Collegian Staff

It seems like things just keep getting better and better for the Massachusetts women's soccer team.

Despite missing out on the NCAA tournament last season for the first time in seven years, the Minutewomen officially signed four new incoming recruits during the national signing period. Tack on the return of Robin Smith, Kate Webb, Martha Conover and Brooke Bartlett, all of whom were injured last season, and that pushes the total to a mix of eight new faces for the 1999 season.

UMass now can add two more players to the roster for the upcoming season. Although Minutewomen coach Jim Rudy can not officially comment on either Kara Ciocca or Andrea Trujillo because neither has signed a national letter of intent, it is expected that both players will be part of the squad in the fall.

Ciocca is a local product who has attended Springfield Tech for the past two seasons. The Wilbraham native was the rated junior college player in New England while earning All-American honors this past season.

"UMass has always been known as a quality soccer program, plus it's close to home, which is also important to me," said Ciocca, who will enter UMass as a junior in the fall. "I'm just hoping to contribute in any way that I can. Hopefully I will be able to help the team out with my speed."

Ciocca was also a two-time All-New England pick while at Tech, and was also ranked in the top 10 nationally in both campaigns. She tallied 27 goals and nine assists in only 17 games last year.

Trujillo is a Colorado native, joining Tarah Tokarchik and Kathleen Machamer as fellow Minutewomen who hail from the Rocky Mountain State. Twice an honorable mention All- State pick, Trujillo picked UMass over the University of Southern California, Colorado University, the University of San Francisco and Davidson. Stanford University was also rumored to be in the hunt for her services.

"I loved everything about UMass. The girls and the coaching staff were great, plus the whole past [tradition] that the team has," Trujillo said.

The relationship between UMass and Trujillo became even more evident in the fall, when the Minutewomen played a weekend set in Boulder against CU and Texas.

"That gave me a good feeling for their style of play and how I would fit in," Trujillo said.

A midfielder/defender, Trujillo was a three-time All-Metro League selection, while also earning All-Star honors at the UMass, North Carolina and Stanford soccer camps.

Minutewomen put together impressive spring

Although last year's 10-11 final record was clearly disappointing to Rudy and the Minutewomen, there is a strong feeling that things will be back to normal in Amherst this fall.

UMass went 10-2-1 in 13 games during the winter and spring, including a 2-1-1 mark outdoors. The Minutewomen closed out their spring season on Saturday with a 3-0 win over Canadian power John Abbott College.

"It was a great way to finish," Rudy said. "It was the culmination of a very, very good winter and spring. We were strong and explosive and kept up the pressure in the attack zone and defensive end for 90 minutes."

Machamer, Sarah Cook and Cindy Garceau each scored a goal for UMass in the win, while Smith continued to show signs of a full recovery by notching a pair of scores.

After going 8-1 while indoors, the Minutewomen played New Hampshire to a 0-0 tie in their first game outside. A 2- 1 loss to Syracuse followed a week later, before defeating the Springfield Sirens of the W-USL in a match back on May 2.

Rudy credits the spring success to a renewed commitment that the players showed during the off-season.

"We had some priorities here. We wanted to raise the level of training and commitment," he said. "The UMass strength trainers did a great job of creating a program, and [assistant coach] Rachel LeDuc also came up with a great fitness program. That [the strength and fitness training] combined with the commitment pro-

John Robic, here talking to former UMass guard Edgar Padilla, has left the Minuteman coaching staff to take the reigns of the Youngstown State basketball program.

Hoop assistant Robic hired by YSU

By Aaron Saykin
Collegian Staff

Massachusetts men's basketball associate head coach John Robic was named head coach of the Youngstown State University program yesterday, ending his 11-year tenure with the Minutemen.

According to reports from the YSU web page, as well as the Springfield Union News, Robic had previously undergone a series of interviews and a 12-hour screening process with his new school before his hiring was made official yesterday. He had also interviewed at New Hampshire, but was not named to its list of finalists.

"I am excited and looking forward to the opportunity to work with the returning players on and off the court, in the community, and in an effort to take YSU to new heights," Robic said.

The Penguins are attempting to improve upon their 14-14 record from the 1998-99 campaign. Their previous coach, Dan Peters, accepted an assistant coaching job with Bob Huggins at the University of Cincinnati.

"We will begin work immediately to be at our best next March at the Mid-Continent Conference Tournament in Fort Wayne, Indiana," Robic said.

In addition to his service under current UMass head coach Bruiser Flint, Robic also spent eight seasons under former coach John Calipari. During his time in Amherst, Robic enjoyed seven trips to the NCAA Tournament, as well as a Final Four appearance in 1996. In his 11 seasons on the periphery of the coaching staff, the Minutemen won a total of 299 games, including a .690 winning percentage.

Robic is also responsible for the recruiting of highly-touted players such as Chris Kirkland and Mike Babul; however, he has also drawn Jonathan DePina and Ronell Blizzard, both of whom are yet to live up to their billing.

The new coaching vacancy leaves UMass without a recruiter/ associate coach. The Union News reported that Flint may fill the position with assistant coach and close friend Geoff Arnold, but could also look for an outside candidate.

Curtain call for Collegian sports seniors

After 4 years, a fond farewell

One hundred ninety weeks ago yesterday, my first two bylined articles ran in the sports section of The Massachusetts Daily Collegian. Today, my final two pieces are running.

I don't know if I'm ready to leave yet.

What I do know is that despite a nice looking line on my resume that says editor-in-chief, the sports department has always been my first love.

When I came to UMass I had no idea what I wanted to do with my life (save for making my parents proud, and I promise I will someday). I commuted, I lived with my family, I didn't socialize. Every day I sat alone in the Hatch at noon, eating my grilled cheese and tomato sandwich, reading the Collegian. One day I saw a notice for a sports meeting (no experience necessary — and that's still the way we operate).

The rest, as they say, is history. I've been down here since. Along the way, I've had some pretty great experiences.

Before I tell you about them, I just want to clear up one little thing: I am a girl. I know a lot of people on this campus think that because I write sports and because I am named Casey, that I must be a boy. Sorry. I'm all woman.

But I am a guy's girl. I can beat most of my guy friends at pool, and I can kick all their asses at Pop-a-Shot.

So during my years here, I spent 18 hours in a van with four guys for the chance to watch UMass kick the crap out of Georgia Southern for the NCAA Division I-AA National Championship. I stayed up until 5 a.m. in the hotel room, making signs ("All I want for XMAS is a national title") and confetti. Man, was it worth losing that sleep.

And as a fan in Atlanta, I watched the Minuteman hoop team advance to the Final Four. I drove two days to cover the men's lacrosse team's 8-7 win over Notre Dame last year. And because the timing was right, I got to see Wrigley Field (Kerry Woods' first major league win, don't ya know). I also got to see Camden Yards last year. I also drove to Pittsburgh (NCAA hoop tourney), Atlanta (another NCAA hoop tourney), Durham, N.C. (men's lacrosse)

Last semester the Collegian stopped printing before we went to Chattanooga, Tenn. for the Division I-AA National Championship game, which the UMass Minutemen football team won in style. Congratulations to coach Mark Whipple and the football team on a job well done, and being a senior it will be tough for me to make every home game next year, but I will make a couple. I hope these UMass fans learn to get off their ass on Saturday afternoons and support the great program tradition that is starting up here.

Admissions criteria remains a hot topic

By Jake Lilien
Collegian Staff

Perhaps the most heated issue on the University of Massachusetts campus over the 1998-99 academic year was student reaction to the University's February decision to cut back on the use of race as a factor in admissions.

Several rallies were held over the course of the following two months, with infuriated students asserting that the University had "eliminated affirmative action", and demanding a return to previous admissions policies.

The uproar began when the university formally announced that race would be deprioritized as a factor in the University's selection of the Class of 2003. UMass Chancellor David K. Scott stated that this decision would lead to significant reduction in the number of ALANA (Asian, Latino/a, African, Native American) students in the incoming freshman class. The percentage of students of color, Scott said, would likely decrease from the Class of 2002, comprised of 19 percent ALANA students.

The change was prompted, Scott said, by a recent decision of the Massachusetts First District Court demanding that the public high school Boston Latin end its practice of using racial quotas in admissions. While the UMass's admissions policies did not use quotas, Scott cited the "changing legal climate" regarding race-based admissions as the University's motivation for the decision.

His comments sparked an outrage amongst the student body. The Student Government Association [SGA] passed a resolution requesting the University to put a year-long "moratorium" on any admissions changes, a request which the University ignored.

Numerous protests were held throughout the spring, in which students stormed both the University Admissions Office and Whitmore Administration Building.

"We need to build an opposition movement so strong they will be begging to reinstate affirmative action," said graduate student Kiya Stokes addressing a crowd of 100 students gathered at the first rally, held on February 25. "If we don't get it, we will shut this place down!"

Vice-Chancellor for Student Affairs Javier Cevallos defended the changes to students at another rally held on March 25, saying that the University's previous admissions policies were "not legal."

He pointed to the University's former practice of placing applicants in categories based on their desirability, and said that in one category, almost 100 percent of ALANA students were accepted, as opposed to only 65 percent of whites.

"I'm a Latino and I am a strong believer in affirmative action, but I also believe in the law," Cevallos said.

Chancellor David K. Scott has announced that the University has developed several plans of increasing minority representation in the student body, one of which is to hold "phone banks" in which accepted minority students would be called and encouraged to attend. Another, more long-term plan, Scott said, is the creation of a "systemic outreach program" to aid minority students in Massachusetts high schools.

Although the university has yet to release exact figures, Chancellor Scott predicted that the Class of 2003 would consist of 13 to 15 percent ALANA students.

Student run businesses to directly feel privatization

By Jason Trankle
Collegian Staff

Privatization is expected to hit the University of Massachusetts Campus Center sometime next fall and some students are concerned it may mean higher food prices.

The effects of privatization would include the universities decision to contract corporate and retail food catering services. These corporate businesses would pay the university for being allowed to distribute their food products to UMass students. The food businesses would, in effect, receive all profit they extract from the students.

As of the end of this semester, the businesses known as The Bluewall, Hatch, Coffee Shop, and Textbook Annex are mainly student-run. However, with a change in direction towards privatization this would all change significantly.

Frank Borgers, assistant professor at the Labor Center, asked people in attendance to question what UMass of the future would look like. He feels there's an immediate need to stop privatization because the political powers are looking to cut the public sectors by decreasing the amount of money the university spends.

The private businesses would extract their own employees. Food prices would likewise increase and all profit would be geared towards increasing the private food retailer's own total revenue.

This past semester, a consultant service came to the university to evaluate food services and the campus bookstore in determining whether privatization would be in the best interest of the college.

The report indicates an overall favorable move towards privatization. However, students like Dave Hammer, a graduate student in the Labor Center, says it's questionable why the report releases certain facts while withholding others that may be just as important.

"These are not good reports," Hammer said. "They talk about profit loss and not about quality [service]."

Hammer indicated that the consultants chose to focus on only five of the seven areas of all labor forum. It is such "sloppy logic", he feels the Board of Trustees will be examining when they make a decision on whether to privatize the university. The decision will be made by June 1, 1999.

Many students are concerned over the issue that the administration will be making its final decision when most students are away on summer break. Scott Cashman, Textbook Annex manager, feels UMass needs to make changes to their operation of retain food services.

"UMass needs to redefine their philosophy of operation and provide high quality service and control the cost of doing that," Cashman said. "What we shouldn't do is take money from other areas of campus to support the services we're offering."

Parking fees to rise

By Jake Lilien
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts has announced the official prices of parking permits for the next two years.

By the 2000-2001 academic year, the cost of parking permit stickers will rise by as much as 400 percent.

The cost of yellow parking stickers, available to all University students and faculty, will eventually quadruple. The price of the stickers, which cost $10 for the current academic year, will double to $20 for the coming year, and double again to $40 for 2000-2001. Purple stickers, also available to all students and faculty, will rise from their present price of $30 to $60 next year, and finally to a sliding scale of $55-90 for the next ($65 for students). Green stickers, available to University faculty and commuter students, will rise from their current average of $34 to $70, and then to a scale of $60-100 ($85 for students).

Vice Chancellor for Administration and Finance Paul Page, who announced the new prices, defended the increases.

"There are several reasons for this," he said. "The first is that, for the last several years, [Parking Services] has been incurring a deficit. And with normal inflation and cost-of living increases for Parking Services employees, the deficit will go up."

"The second," he continued, "is that we have maintenance issues. We have not been providing adequate monies for maintenance for repairs of the whole parking system."

Under the University's plan, the price increases will generate funding for the upcoming repair of the Campus Center Garage, as well as planned renovations of 10 campus parking lots.

Among the lots to be renovated is Yellow Lot 10, located near the Mather Career Center, which has been the subject of numerous student complaints.

The price of all parking permits, including those only available to staff, will rise substantially. The cost of red lot stickers will rise from $55-100, to $125, to $115-185, while the cost of blue lot stickers will rise from $40-60, to $95, to $80-160.

According to Page, the price of parking permits has not increased in twelve years, which he cites as another reason for the sharpness of the hikes.

"[The hikes] should have been done more frequently," said Page. "We would have avoided as severe an increase if we had gradually raised them."

Fees for parking at the campus garage will also rise, although less sharply. Per-hour parking rates for the campus garage will rise from 90 cents to $1 an hour, while per-day rates will rise from $9 to $10. Fees for selected parking meters will rise from 75 to 90 cents per hour.

The prices were determined during contract negotiations between the UMass administration and five University unions: the Graduate Employee Organization [GEO], the Massachusetts Society of Professors [MSP], the American Federation of State and County Municipal Employees [AFSCME], the United Staff Association [USA], and the SEIU, a professional staff union. Only one of the unions, GEO, is comprised of students.

Town smoking ban faces protest from bar owners

By Jill Carroll
Collegian Staff

Students planning on having a cigarette and a drink at their favorite Amherst bar this fall may need to think again.

Last May, Town Meeting, the body that passes legislation in Amherst, shot down the last chance of lifting the smoking ban in bars.

An article was brought before Town Meeting asking that the ban be lifted for bars that install specialized ventilation systems until there is a state-wide ban. The ban also affects restaurants, but restaurant owners have not protested its implementation.

The ban has pitted the Board of Health, which instituted it, against the bar owners in a heated, but deadlocked debate over the past year.

The article lost 65 to 120 after debate from both sides. Even if the article had passed, it may not have meant the variance would be allowed because Town Meeting can only make suggestions as to the Board. But Select Board Chairperson Bryan Harvey felt suggestions are just what are needed.

"The dialogue has broken down. Town Meeting is the only means [we have to] move beyond this impasse," he said.

Bar owners have been fighting the smoking ban since it began being enforced last summer saying they are losing money as patrons go to bars in neighboring towns that allow smoking.

Several bars would not enforce the ban over the last year and received tickets from an undercover smoking ban enforcement officer because of it.

The Board of Health argues there are no ventilation systems that are both affordable and effective. They also argue that allowing bars with specialized systems to allow smoking would be unfair to smaller bars in town that can't afford to install ventilation systems.

But the bottom line for the Board is public health.

"I came here before you tonight to add a little fresh air to the discussion," said Board Chairperson Valerie Steinberg at the May 5 Town Meeting. "[The ventilation system] is costly to construct, costly to [maintain] and it doesn't protect the workers."

But bar owners say they are losing money and it isn't unfair if another bar can't afford to install a ventilation system or other means of limiting smoke.

"I haven't been paid in three weeks," said Old Amherst Ale House owner Eugene O'Neil at Town Meeting. "[They] say it's unfair to other bars, [but] that's competition."

Jerry Jolly, owner of the Pub and Rafter's and who was the force behind the article, said he wasn't sure what he would do since the article didn't pass.

"We've got to cut back on employees," Jolly said. "The smaller places may not stay in business."

But after the last year of debate over the ban, that included much criticism of the Board, Steinberg was happy Amherst had spoken in favor of it.

"It's a real endorsement," she said. "It's nice to know there is support from Town Meeting."

Last spring, the debate moved from Board of Health meetings into the courts as bar owners refused to pay tickets issued to them for allowing smoking.

Dozens of tickets were unpaid and pending in court last spring. Steinberg said because the first several cases were lost by the bar owners, and there were so many cases yet to go that would probably also lose, the Board and bar owners may be working out a deal.

She said the deal was in a very preliminary stage as of May, but it would probably be along the lines of dismissing the rest of the cases in court if the bar owners begin strictly enforcing the ban.

Because the only reason the bar owners oppose the ban is because neighboring towns don't have one, another article was brought before Town Meeting requesting state representatives to bring legislation for a state-wide ban.

The article passed and in addition to requesting State Senator Ellen Story and State Representative Stan Rosenberg, to enact a state-wide ban, it requests the money given to the commonwealth from tobacco settlements be used to enforce the state-wide ban.

A similar article was passed by Town Meeting a year ago, but no legislation was enacted by the two representatives.

UM offers many options to stay safe

Several tips given to keep yourself protected

By Stacey Shackford
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts, with nearly 20,000 students, is the size of a small city. It shares many of the same public safety concerns one would find in a city.

UMass Chief of Police John Luippold wants students to keep this in mind as they prepare to attend the University, and to be aware of the options available to them.

Escort Services

Public safety suggests that students do not walk alone late at night. As an alternative, the university offers an escort service for students who feel uncomfortable walking across campus alone at night. The escort service van has 11 designated stops around campus, including stops in each of the five residential areas.

The route starts and ends in the Southwest Residential Area and takes approximately 25 minutes to complete. The service runs from 5 p.m. to 3 a.m. seven days a week when school is in session, and on a limited basis after 3 a.m. and during semester break.

Another vehicle travels to the outer parking areas and campus apartment complexes. Walking escorts are also available to accompany you to the nearest designated pick- up point, or to your destination.

Call 545-2123 for additional information about schedules and pick-up points, or to request an escort.

Theft

Public Safety also suggests that students should never leave their possessions unattended. According to reports in the campus police log, larceny is rather common.

"I strongly recommend that students lock their doors whenever they are not in their rooms and when they enter their rooms for the night," Luippold said.

In order to prevent bicycle theft, police offer a bicycle registration service. Bike registration is free and a registration sticker will be put on the bike. The bicycle's serial number and description is entered into the police computer system.

Students may also have their bikes engraved with their name and social security number. The engraving process can also be used with other valuables that students bring to campus.

Police have bike registration tables set up at various times during the semester. Interested students may also bring their bikes to Public Safety for registration by calling 545-2121.

Personal Safety

Rape and sexual assault is a problem on many college campuses, including UMass. There were many incidents of acquaintance rape reported during the last academic year. Students should be cautious, especially about the possibility of the use of the drug known as "roofies".

"[We're] very concerned about the possibility of roofies being utilized during sexual assaults or as part of a sexual assault," said Luippold. "I would caution individuals to be aware of their surroundings. If they choose to drink, they should not take drinks from punch bowls nor drinks offered to them by individuals they don't know."

Students should report any instances of sexual assault to the police at 545-2121. They can also utilize the services available on campus, such as the Everywomen's Center Rape Line at 545-2677 and the Violence Against Women Crisis Line at 545-0800.

Public Safety also encourages all women to take advantage of the free self-defense class, RAD (Rape Aggression Defense). RAD is offered twice a semester and is available free to all UMass female students and faculty. The class is small and available on a first-come, first-serve basis.

In light of three recent pedestrian accidents, students should be cautious when crossing streets. Always use crosswalks. Student drivers should observe pedestrian right of way.

Alcohol

According to University Health Services, "One of the most important decisions you will make is how, when, where and how much you will drink or whether to drink at all. If you choose to drink, we encourage you to know your limits, drink in moderation and periodically assess your drinking habits."

By drinking responsively, students will also be able to minimize the chances of finding themselves in a dangerous situation.

The drinking age is strictly enforced on this campus and a new drinking policy makes strict sanctions for alcohol violations.

Students who have any questions concerning any programs offered by the UMass Police department should call 545-2121.

SGA offers students a chance to shape UM

By Danielle Fugazy
Collegian Staff

What else is there at the University of Massachusetts besides an education? Well, there is the Student Government Association (SGA). The SGA is in charge of 1.5 million dollars and, other than what happens in the classrooms, the SGA makes the decisions on campus.

The SGA dispenses the 1.5 million dollars every year to all the different Registered Student Organizations (RSOs) on campus. With approximately 250 RSOs, the SGA does not have an easy job. UMass has a wide range of RSOs that range from dance teams to chess clubs and everything else in between.

The SGA meets every Wednesday night and this is when the real action begins. Each Residential Area has senators who are elected by the residents of the area. They then go to the meetings, which are open to the public, and debate for and against motions written by the senators.

Motions address issues such as fighting parking fee increases or adding better lighting to campus walkways. The meetings have been known to become very heated when the senators fight for the best thing for their particular living area.

The SGA includes a president and student trustee, the president's appointed cabinet and the senators.

Jeff Howe won the presidential election in March and will remain president of the SGA until next March. Howe is a political science major and has served as a senator from the Orchard Hill Residential Area for two years. Up until his move to president he was the area governor of Orchard Hill.

Citing the importance of a vocal SGA, Howe encourages students to take an interest.

"The SGA needs to be supported by people who speak up," Howe said.

Seth Avakian also won during the March elections but he will not officially take office as trustee until June 1. Since winning the election, he has been working closely with the current student trustee to learn the ropes of the job. As the student trustee, Avakian's job includes meeting with the board of trustees in Boston and letting them know what the UMass Amherst campus wants or needs.

Avakian is a political science major and has been involved with the SGA for three and half years. He says of the SGA, "Not only can you be productive, but it is a pretty good way to meet people too."

Senate seats are constantly opening up. Serving on Senate is a good way to start a career in the SGA. For information, the SGA is located in room 420 of the Student Union Building.

Letter from the Editors

Welcome to the University of Massachusetts, or, as we like to call it, UMass. Believe me, no matter how much fun you're having at orientation, it only gets better.

If you are reading this, then you are among the luckiest of the incoming first year students. In your hands is a copy of the largest college daily in New England. We publish a newspaper five days a week that is read by many students on campus.

The editorial/opinion page is the page of the UMass student voice. We have regular writers — people who have made a commitment to write for us — but we also take submissions from anybody. That's right, anyone can become famous for a day. We can't promise that your name will be in lights; messy black ink is the best we can do.

If you can't commit to writing a column but still have an opinion, we also take letters to the editor from students, faculty, University staff, residents from Amherst and Northampton and even Chancellor Scott on occasion.

Get it? We want to hear from you. You don't need to be an English or a journalism major to write editorials for us. We want people from all different majors and interests because the writing of many voices is a more accurate reflection of the diversity of opinions on this campus.

From political Insults to borderline blasphemous attacks at the Chancellor, ed/op pushes the limit of your first amendment right: the freedom of expression. Only on this page can you say virtually anything about anything and get away with it.

But ed/op isn't just a page for random venting. There is always something political going on on this campus, and that is when ed/op becomes your voice. Your opinions need to be voiced in order for this paper to properly serve the campus community. Whether you agree or disagree with the current issues on campus, we need to hear from you.

Remember, you don't need to be a journalism major or political scientist to contribute. It's your page and your voice. Write for Ed/Op!

The truth about UMass

I don't even want to think about school right now. After two years I have learned to treasure my summer breaks, because they never last long enough. Before I know it, I'll be back at UMass sitting in beautiful Machmer Hall taking classes again.

I can't believe that I have been here for two whole years already and that when I come back next year I will be a junior. It seems like just yesterday that I was at freshman orientation, waiting in line for a cold shower at 6 a.m. while being herded around like an old couple on a planned senior vacation. Well, now I am two years older and wiser, and I'm ready to grab this school by the horns. I have decided to dispell some common misconceptions that most people have about the university.

Matt Frascella

1. The Basketball Team is bad. Any real UMass student knows that this is not true. We have one of the most successful programs in Division I basketball. We lost nothing when John Calipari stepped down and left Bruiser Flint in control. Bruiser has signed so many amazing recruits that Duke and UNC better watch out. I think we could even beat the pro teams next year. March Madness, baby.

2. The UMass police have too many resources This is definitely false. The campus police require brand new Ford Expedition SUV's to patrol the University. The CD player, leather seats, and power everything are essential for busting all those kids with beer and weed. Who needs funding for the periodicals in the library? Petition the Chancellor to give the UMass police more money. I think they should buy some helicopters with search lights. We could even get K.I.T. from Knight Rider to enforce the law.

3. Amherst is a Puritan town. Amherst is one of the most liberal towns in the country. We are right near Northampton, for God's sake. I know this is a liberal town because the citizens allow the Amherst police to carry assault rifles. Assault rifles go well with a lazy little Western Massachusetts town. I don't think that any other police department in the country allows their cops to carry assault rifles. That's progressive for you.

4. The Dining Commons serve lousy food. This one everyone hears about, but it, too, is untrue. The DC's ranked highest in overall satisfaction among students. Their food is always warm, tasty, and the variety is unmatched. The workers are always friendly and they welcome you to the campus community from day one. What's best about the DC though is that when you leave, you will wear that wonderful fragrance, au de DC, around with you on your clothes all day long.

5. Class sizes are too large. This is another misconception about the University. Classes of over 200 students have been my favorite ones. Just last semester I took a class with two sections that, combined, were over 600 kids and included one woman who was about 45 years old who always asked dumb questions. We had our final in the William D. Mullins Center (don't ask me who William D. Mullins is because I don't have a clue). I sat in section LL. That was a great class, though, and I got an A. Class size didn't detract from my learning experience at all.

6. Residential Areas are stereotyped. This rumor is truly outlandish. Who ever said that the drug addict hippies live in Central in one large fish bowl of weed smoke? I've never heard that. Sylvan is a ghetto? Get out of here. I think I heard someone jokingly say that the dorks are all in Northeast. Maybe that is how this rumor started, but no one should believe it.

7. The dorm buildings are nasty. I know seniors who are clammoring to stay in the dorms because they are so nice. My dorm room has been such a suite that the Ritz Carlton has nothing on it. That metal furniture from the 70's is so nice that I want to take it with me when I graduate. I think it is the same furniture that was there when Richard Gere lived in my room the really did — check the archives in the library if you don't believe me). I even found some hamster fur so I know that Dick Gere was definitely there back in the day.

8. There are too many protests on campus. This one has gotten a lot of press, to spread the myth even further. Last semester we only had about one protest per week. Sure, some of these protests even traveled to other cities and states to continue protesting. The proposed protest involving Registered Student Organizations will likely only have a few thousand members and better funding than our Spring Concert, but I propose a protest to protest the protesting RSO next year.

Well, there you have it. I have dispelled the eight biggest misconceptions about this school. See you in the fall.

Lessons from the master

So, you're a freshman, eh? That's unfortunate. You'll get older eventually. Before you do, though, you've got all sorts of important lessons to learn about life at the big, bad university, and, for some reason that God only knows, I'm going to teach you. Buckle your seatbelts.

Seth Koenig

Important lesson of life No. 1 — Don't sign up for those credit cards that they'll be offering outside the dining commons! Okay, so the free T-Shirt will save you from doing a load of laundry for a day, but it just isn't worth it. Visa takes your soul in the fine print of that little form you fill out. Look closely.

Important lesson of life No. 2 — Read the Collegian and complain about literally everything you read in it. That way, you can be like the rest of the esteemed UMass campus. If you see something like "hedonistic utilitarianism" ever so slightly misspelled, make it a point to make the writer's life a living hell. God forbid you let a writer or editor get away with being human. Heavens no!

Appreciating the work it takes to put out a daily newspaper while balancing classes and work is completely unacceptable. Bitch away!

(Note: The above paragraphs were sarcastic. If you didn't know that, you probably don't belong at a university of any sort — with the exception of maybe UConn — so go home and don't return to this place until you have some social training.)

Important lesson of life No. 3 — The sports teams at this school are good. Watch them.

The softball team won the Atlantic 10 championships, as did the field hockey team and the women's track and field team. The football team took home the National title after putting Georgia Southern in their place by a score of 55-43.

The water polo team ended the year ranked No. 10 in the country, and both the men's and women's lacrosse teams began their respective seasons in the top 20. Despite some rough times, our basketball teams have quite the tradition, too, so recognize. Peace.

Important lesson of life No. 4 — People are outnumbered 12 to one by squirrels on this campus, so watch what you say. Avoid saying things like, "Geez, I hate rudents of all sorts. I'd very much like all the squirrels to die a horrible death!" You'll get your ass kicked, I promise.

Important lesson of life No. 5 — If you're a communications major, enjoy life in the slow lane. Otherwise, get used to a lot of work. Ha! You should have thought about that before you came here. In fact, here's a brief rundown of some of the majors offered by the University:

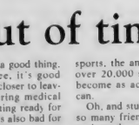
History: The major name aptly describes your employed life once you graduate.

English: If you don't know this language already, it's too late to be majoring in it. Sorry to break it to you the hard way. Besides, nobody's going to hire someone just for mastering the English tongue. Now that I mention it, most gas stations will probably pass over you for just that reason.

SOM (School of Management): How to spend money you don't have; a UMass specialty. Watch as pointless construction is done to upgrade things like the benches by the campus pond, while the out-of-state students plummet into debt paying for this work. Learn the tricks of the trade seeing the auditoriums at the school slowly and painfully decompose one by one as those ever-so-important benches begin to shine. A career at UMass is guaranteed.

Anthropology: Defined very logically as "the study of ants." And you thought it was about the human race...

Sport management: This major explains the major mysteries of the sports world while serving as the curriculum of half of the school's athletic community. Find out why the Patriots passed up Atlanta tailback and the NFC's top rusher in 1998, Jamal Anderson, because they were too hell-bent-for-election on getting Boston College center Damien Woody and screwball linebacker Andy Katzenmoyer from Ohio State in the draft. Those of you not privy to the happenings of the Pats, don't worry. You'll learn about that, too.



Important lesson of life No. 6 — There's more red tape at the Whitmore Administration Building than on a bleeding mummy tand with all that gruesome crap they do to the corpse, bleeding is by no means out of the question). Get used to it.

Out of time

So, I'm going to be a senior. That's a good thing, right? Well, not exactly. You see, it's good because it means that I'm one step closer to leaving the undergraduate world and entering medical school, both of which mean that I'm getting ready for the "real world." But becoming a senior is also bad for the same reasons.

Becoming a senior is rather disappointing in a way because in a year, I'll be leaving this school forever. Yeah, it's going to be great to cut open a cadaver in gross anatomy next year, but there are so many things at this university that are unique to UMass, and I don't want to let them go.

Gary Mendese

Yeah, you're going to hear bad things about the dining commons, the Housing Assignment Office (HAO), roommates, the Graduate Employee Organization (GEO) and you'll be witness to a number of protests on campus pertaining to issues like "boxers or briefs" and "Tinky Winky is not queer!" But you know what? You're going to miss those things when you leave here.

You might be thinking, "I just freaking got here! What is this guy talking about?" Well, I'm just telling you to enjoy every waking moment of your time here, because this school has so much to offer you, and before you know it... poof! Your time is up and you're a senior.

As you'll find out throughout the semester, I am normally sarcastic and write funny (to me anyway), snide columns, but I can't really joke about this subject. I have been here for a couple of years now, and I still haven't experienced college to its fullest. This school has over 100 Registered Student Organizations (including the Collegian), a number of intramural sports, the amusing MassPIRG rallies and oh yeah... over 20,000 students. Take advantage of them and become as active in the campus community as you can.

Oh, and studying isn't such a bad idea either. I have so many friends who are becoming either juniors or seniors who still say, "Oh, I'm going out the Delta Chi tonight. Yeah, I know I've gone out for the past five nights in a row. My term paper? I already blew this semester, so who cares? I'll bring my GPA up next year." Well, there are so many "next years" in one's college career. And for those of you who have heard the myth stating that "freshman year doesn't really count anyway. Graduate Schools understand that you're still adjusting to a new environment," I've got some news for you: although that might have some merit, it's basically a crock of B.S. Yeah, they might excuse a 1.5 GPA for one semester if you make Dean's List every semester thereafter, but that 1.5 doesn't ever get erased and it factors into your cumulative GPA.

Look, I don't want you to think that I'm just lecturing you or anything, because I'm not. I'm just showing you the reality of college life. I have had some great times here at the University, made many friends and have taken part in a few extracurricular activities, but I want to do more and only have one year to do it. I wish I had actually paid attention to those "stupid floor meetings" and got off my duff to join an extra club, try a new language, have sex in the library and maybe even join a protest or two. They're your four years — just be sure to make the most of them.

Welcome to the working week

Psst. Come here. I told them I was gone. But I'm right here. One last time.

I snuck in through the brush, under the barbed-wire and past security. I bribed a friend of mine to sneak me on campus hiding in the laundry basket. So now I'm here. But only for a moment.

Cinderella (the band, not the fairy tale character) said that you don't know what you got 'till it's gone. Amen, brothers. Amen. Because it is only now, in hindsight, that I realize how much I miss some things. Like mom and dad paying the bills.

Four years of college has taught me how to breath fire and three years of English has taught me how to come up with poetic but shallow phrases like "Four years of college has taught me how to breath fire." Do I know what that means? Hell no. Give me a job.

So I guess as the graduate voice of this here page, I should pass on some of the knowledge I've accrued over my years. Whatever.

I was in your place four years ago, and let me tell you, there was no calm voice there whispering in my ear about how to live my life in fair Amherst. The only whispering voice in my orientation room belonged to Jesus. My roommate Jesus, who, curled into a fetal position on his bed, softly murmured "Mommy, am I doing alright?" (Yeah, you did good, kid — not really.)

So lay on the Amherst Common with some friends. Eat Bueno Y Sano and Antonio's often. Eat at Pasta E Basta when your wallet can handle it. Shop at Newbury Comics, because it's the cheapest and has the best selection. And try to get classes where you have to buy books at the Jeffrey Amherst Bookstore.

Don't just talk to your teachers if you want better grades. Make sexual advances towards them.

Mike Messaros

Go to the Academy in Music in Northampton to see an "art movie." It's $10 for two tickets, $6 for one, so bring a friend (preferably someone you're sweet on). The place is gorgeous. There is no place better to see a movie. In fact, just stay in Northampton.

Wear sunscreen. Oh, wait...

Go overseas. You have the amazing opportunity to study at some of the top colleges in the world. Go to Oxford. Go to Cambridge. Trinity in Dublin. The Sorbonne. Just get out. If you don't go for a year, go for a semester or a summer. (Shout-outs to Prof. David Paroissien and the UMass Oxford Summer Seminar.) And take classes at the other colleges around here. That was one of the most enticing things about this place when I first came here, yet I never took a class at Amherst or Smith. (P.S. guys, even though Smith is all female, they don't like the kid who took french at Smith just to mock. Not cool.)

Keep away from parking services because they will absolutely, at any moment, without warning, bend you over a barrel. They're the type of people around whom you don't drop your soap in prison. (All the ex-cons in the house represent.)

Root for the football team until they're bad. Then say that you were a fan of the basketball team "in the lean years."

Get an email account. It will rock your world.

Finally, if you don't write for the Collegian (which I heartily suggest), then do something. (But just know this, guys — the Collegian's got the finest ladies on campus. Hot and cold running ladies.) Just don't get involved with the Republicans. They eat their young.

Remember this: everyone else is just as afraid as you are. No matter how cocky the strut, firm the handshake or wide the smile, everyone is absolutely quaking. People will like you. Unless you're psycho. Which you're not.

So make friends. Use people's names even if they don't know yours (it forces them to learn yours). Go to parties, if only for a few minutes, to survey the scene. Buy the drinks one time (when you're of age, of course). Borrow CDs. Challenge someone in NHL '99 (a personal favorite).

The point is, these are the best years of your lives. Damn it. I said it. I'm officially old. It's true, though. As much as there were times over my college career I wanted to just drop out and start a jug band in Arkansas, I'm going to miss this place. Sniff.

Now I have to get back to "the real world" before they miss me.

P.S. I need a job.

Proud and strong

As you can probably tell, the Pioneer Valley is a great place to be gay. UMass, as well as the entire five college area, is the home of many GLBT events.

The Pride Alliance office is located on the second floor of the student union. Pride Alliance is a group of GLBT students that meets weekly to discuss and plan queer life on campus. The office has a schedule of upcoming meetings and GLBT events. Another great resource is the Stonewall Center, located in Southwest.

The Stonewall Center has a free library of GLBT literature and movies. They also publish a calander of GLBT events that is available by mail or email. In addition, the Stonewall Center sponsors a speakers bureau. The speakers bureau is made up of GLBT panelists, and they speak about coming out issues or relevant topics in residence halls and classrooms.

Mary Miles

Queerfest, an annual celebration of gay pride, is held in May. Queerfest sponsors comedians and musicians to perform on the campus center lawn during the day, and in the evening, sponsors a dance.

Many GLBT students opt to live on the Two-in-20 floor. Located in Mary Lyon in the Northeast residential area. The Two-in-20 floor is inhabited by GLBT students and their allies. The floor offers a great sense of community for residents, and sponsors Queer coffeehouses in the basement and a yearly pilgrimage to Provincetown at the end of the year.

As you can see, there are plenty of ways to meet other GLBT students in the area as well as a variety of resources to tap into. The Collegian has a page devoted to GLBT issues that comes out every other week, and we are always looking for new writers. Stop by and have a great year!

Connection

I'm sorry but the love that you are trying to reach has been disconnected

The value of life relationships has been constantly disrespected

We have neglected to see that we are all victims

Of the evil thoughts that roam the planet as our minds sit numb

Some become stressed, while the rest try to test

Neither asking the questions that unite them to the quest

What are WE going to do?

'Cause these social problems can't end with only me or you

We must combine our efforts to the task and combat evils finest tool: separation

Rearrange our connections for clearly educated communication

You cannot abominate all hate, yet we can use each other as means to educate

And to educate simply means to give instruction

Exposing your mentality and morality to reconstruction

You can also educate by doing nothing

Giving the impression that there's nothing to be done

Since we are all treated equally, living under the sun?

So why should I feel any shame, or be the one to blame

When one of my good friends is (please fill in your token name)

But what is your primary aim, to make new friends or to make the world a safe place

Free of discrimination on the basis of gender, religion, orientation, race...

Take a look at you face and find your active place in the puzzle

Stop wearing the visual muzzle that tells your vision

What to expect from a collision of diverse decisions

search for truth, people are walking books to read

But that will only suffice half the deed

Unless you apply your actions to your daily life routine

Then maybe a change will occur throughout the bigger scene

We often randomly come together and attempt to relate taking for granted the temporary cultures we create connecting for a common goal

Leaving the body and finding your soul

Taking control of the messages you send Realize your hang-ups and try your call again!

What A Woman Is

I want to be a stripper. I really do. It would be good to do it just once. One night. Of course, I probably won't, but why do people think I would be degrading women if I did take it all off while dozens of pitiful boys throw their money at me? At least it would be a job where a woman wouldn't be making 70 cents to every man's dollar. And every one of those suckers' dollars in my g-string would be one dollar less in a man's pocket and one more in a woman's.

Jill Carroll

If I choose to do it of my own free will with a healthy mental and emotional state and it's what makes me happy then why not? Lord knows it pays better than being a reporter.

But maybe my modesty would get the best of me when the music starts (bow chicka bow bow). So what if I dare I say it on a college campus, became a housewife? I could just take my degree in journalism and admire it while I vacuum the rug and make the kid's lunches. That's it. I'll dedicate myself to properly raising the next generation. I'll be part psychiatrist, nutritionist, doctor, chauffeur and chef.

But oh! What a waste of my hard-earned piece of paper.

Everyone is so proud of themselves and their degrees and "enlightenment," but give me a break. What's so enlightened about telling people they can't choose occupations and lifestyles that make them happy?

If you want to get buck naked while wrapped around a brass pole or keep it all on while climbing the corporate ladder, I say go for it. You're the only one who has to live your life so do what makes you happy.

But, of course, this only applies to women who have the option to choose what they want to do in life.

Choices are what gives freedom. Prisoners are without choices, victims are without choices and what a coincidence that choice is just what conservatives are trying to take away from women.

For the lucky individuals who have choices, here's some rules to live by to help make the right ones. Keep in mind this is not an Ann Landers column.

• The secret to success in a career is, (drum roll please), doing what you get paid for. I know, not mind-blowing but it's surprising how many people don't do it. Showing up on time, doing your job thoroughly and not calling in sick will do wonders for a career. Bosses do backflips when they have reliable, productive employees.

• Read.

• If the person you love makes you feel guilty, bad about yourself or powerless, that isn't love. Two words: Get out.

• Read.

• Remember, size 12 is normal.

• Read.

• If a professor is explaining why women can't be CEOs, mathematicians, or in the military, challenge it. There may be women in the room who believe what the old wind-bag is saying.

• Read.

• Remember, you only live once, so eat chocolate. The world's supply is rumored to be exhausted in the next 20 years so stockpile now.

• And maybe I forgot to mention it but, read.

• For god's sake turn off the TV. Why waste time just to get told to buy things, look pretty and be submissive?

And what does it take to be pretty? To be feminine?

It doesn't take a rocket scientist to figure it out, anything like that makes you weaker.

High heels, passivity, excessive thinness, a soft voice, avoiding conflict, approval seeking, pantyhose, playing dumb, waiting your turn? Stop me anytime here, but this looks like a formula for failure.

How seriously can someone who is teetering around in three inch heels, a mini skirt and talking in a mouse-like voice going to be taken? All the things that are qualities of beauty in women are also qualities of powerlessness.

But beauty is the ultimate goal because it's the primary criteria women are judged on.

Let's summarize. To be beautiful you have to be thin (not some muscular hulk), agreeable and not too out spoken — and you have to be beautiful to be loved. Is it just me or is their something psychotic about the whole thing?

Men have to be strong, fast, smart, aggressive and assertive to be attractive. Funny, but last time I checked, those are traits that might get you somewhere.

So start up the music and call me a stripper, because I'm a feminist and I'm fixin' to change what being a woman is.

Judaism as a constant

(Editor's Note: Edited excerpt from a previous column)

Your whole life will changed in a matter of minutes on your first day as a freshman — from everything being predictable and comfortable, to everything being filled with terror and uncertainty. You will have a roommate, freedom, fewer classes, worse food and long distance phone bills.

Renee Cohn

Well, there's just one more variable in my equation: My mother was hounding me to go to Hillel and gain some sort of religious experience as I grasped my independence.

The second day I was here, Hillel had a welcome barbecue. I walked alone from Orchard Hill to frat row on this very overwhelming campus. At the barbecue, I tried to be friendly—I'd been in religious groups for four years—I just felt so overwhelmed. I didn't go back until the High Holidays.

Finally, I met some Jewish kids in my building who were making an effort to get involved with Jewish life on campus. I joined in, realizing that, for once, something in my life was familiar. I sat at Friday night services and noticed tunes that I had heard since I was a child. I looked around, and for once there were people who seemed familiar — they were Jewish, and there was something comforting in that. It was reassuring that, when everything around me was whirling and changing so fast, my religion stayed the same.

I don't keep kosher or speak Hebrew fluently. I can't lead services or keep Shabbat. But I have found where I stand religiously. I now look forward to taking time to shower and wear a dress and pray for 45 minutes Friday night before tackling another college weekend. I find solace in songs and traditions that become more familiar with each passing week. I guess there's something about Judaism that is unchanging and comfortable, not matter where you live.

There have been more benefits: Friends, social gatherings, Friday night dinner and rusch (spirited songs). I suppose I would have found other ways to get my life on schedule in this crazy place we call UMass, but having services every Friday night leaves me feeling fulfilled. If not religiously, then mentally. Having the time to reflect, have some good bread and shake ten hands at the service's conclusion always has me leaving with a smile. I don't know now what I would do without its familiarity.

I haven't become more religious since I've been at UMass, but maybe I've become a little more spiritual. With all of the other changes I've undergone, it's nice to be reminded that Judaism continues to be one thing I can count on—no matter what environment I'm hurled into next.

Jewish students given a voice

By Natty Yagudin
Collegian Staff

Jewish students have a strong voice at the University of Massachusetts thanks in part to the Collegian's commitment to diversity and its endorsement of the Jewish Affairs Page.

The Jewish Affairs Page serves as a forum for students who are interested in Judaism and Jewish related activities at the University of Massachusetts.

The page is published once every two weeks. Topics that are covered in the page include opinion columns, as well as news from Israel and articles about campus events.

Even with the existence of the Jewish Affairs Page, issues and events that are related to Jewish affairs but concern the whole campus often turn up in the news section of the paper.

Jewish students who are looking to explore their religion or find a few friends who are Jewish have many other resources to turn to on campus.

The Hillel House, located on 388 North Pleasant Street, serves as the center of Jewish student life at the university.

Different events, such as the annual fall barbecue for incoming students, take place at the Hillel House.

A Jewish Events Calendar is published monthly and is available at the Hillel House.

The Hillel House also has a residence floor and a Kosher dining hall.

An optional Kosher Meal Plan is available through the University of Massachusetts Dining Services.

Dorm dwellers can attend events planned by Jewish Residential Area Programmers (JRAPers).

The JRAPers are students who plan Jewish related events such as Hannuka parties and get-togethers in the residence halls.

In addition to social programs, religious services take place at both the Hillel House and the Chabad House, which is located close to the Southwest residential area.

Friday night services, as well as services for Rosh Hashana and Yom Kippur, are free and accessible to the public at both places.

Students who wish to study Hebrew or Judaism can take classes through the Judaic and Near Eastern Studies Department.

Also, unique 1-credit classes taken through the Hillel House make it possible to study religious texts or explore other facets of Judaism.

A popular class offered last semester was a "traveling class", in which students took Sunday trips to visit museums and historic sites of Jewish America.

The Jewish Affairs Page in looking for new writers next semester. People who are interested should contact the Collegian at 545-0719.

The Black Affairs staff would like to welcome and congratulate all incoming freshman to the New Millennium here at UMass. We are looking for new students to share their talent and voice as artists, writers and poets with us at the Collegian. No experience necessary.

Multicultural

(Editor's Note: Excerpted from previous column)

I know that most of you think multi-culturalism deals with some obscure tribe in some far away land dancing naked to some strange music, but you would be wrong. The Multicultural Affairs page is for everyone and is about everyone. This page is for the most militant brother in Boston, the most foreign exchange student — anyone, even any white students.

Welcome to UMass, class of 2003, make your presence known.

Welcome To UMass!!

This is your university now.

Bored Already? Here's our UMass TV guide

Tube Notes with Ryan Benharris

When I came to UMass two short years ago, my biggest fear was not like anyone else's. While every normal student was sitting through orientation wondering about the difficulty of the work or who their roommate was going to be, I think I gave myself an ulcer worrying about whether or not I would ever be able to watch "Friends" again.

Now, I'm sure I shouldn't be telling you this right off the bat, because my journalistic talents, as well as my sanity, come into question. When a semi-grown man tells thousands of freshmen that his biggest fear about college is an inability to sit in front of the TV and watch a show pretty much geared to a female audience it's scary, but you know what? I'm shameless!

Since arriving at this wonderful institution, I have not only learned that I can watch "Friends" every Thursday at 8 p.m., but I have also found that the television service that the university provides for us is quite good. So for a glance at the choices in a college student's favorite procrastinating past time, (not including drinking) look no further than "Tube Notes."

The first thing you want to do before you start chillin' in front of the TV is to make sure that you have it hooked up the right way. All you need to do in order to get the full Housing Service Cable line up at any dorm room on the entire campus is purchase a normal cable wire, and hook it up between your TV and the jack in the wall. There's no installation fee and it's available to anyone with a television. This is a very important step in the process, because when I moved into the dorms on Orchard Hill, I nearly electrocuted myself by sticking the cable in the wrong jack. Yes I'm that dumb!)

After installation is complete, you're free to explore the wonderful world of TV that UMass has to offer. Something that you'll probably notice right away is that the cable line-up on campus does not have 250 channels like you have at your house. Last semester, we had 34 channels, and although it's something that is difficult to get used to, quit your crying and suck it up... or at least that's what my freshman roommate said to me when he was sick of my endless balling.

The cable line-up is centered around a variety of network stations that will carry all of the essential broadcast programming, as well as a diverse amount of channels for different cultures. There are two channels on campus that have NBC, CBS and ABC. There is one station for each of FOX, UPN and WB.

Besides network programming, there is also a wide range of cable stations that are available. In the spring semester of 1999, the line-up included the Turner Broadcasting Station (TBS), Black Entertainment Television (BET), The Learning Channel (TLC), The Cartoon Network, Comedy Central, Bloomberg, College Television Network. (which is, in some way, sponsored by CNN).

The latest addition to the line-up last spring was M2. M2 is the spin off of MTV. However, it does not carry the absolutely horrible programming that MTV does, and it shows videos 24 hours a day — commercial free. I feel extremely lucky to be receiving M2 on campus, partly because I don't even get it at my house, and also because I get to see the videos that MTV doesn't play anymore. Unfortunately, you'll have to live your life without "The Tom Greene Show" anymore, but that guy's not worth the effort it would take to punch him in the face.

Besides M2, there's also great music programming on BET and CTN. CTN also has news and sports reports every half hour.

If you're in the mood to watch a movie, you've come to the right place. The university has two different stations that carry and excellent selection of a variety of different films.

One of the movie channels that is available to UMass students, free of charge, is The Sundance Channel. In case you've never seen it before, Sundance airs independent films and documentaries that are very different from the normal movies you may be used to. (And trust me when I say "different". I saw this one thing with Christina Ricci as Little Red Riding Hood. I'm still having nightmares).

The other movie station on campus is one that is unique to UMass. Channel 7 is known as "The Movie Channel" and is completely operated by UMass students on campus. The movie channel shows seven to ten different movies each week, and some of them are so recent that they have just arrived in the video store. Some titles that were on the movie channel last year included, Scream 2, The Rugrats Movie, Armageddon, Deep Impact, Top Gun, Wild Things, and many others. The movie channel is an excellent asset to have on campus, simply because the choice in films is tremendous.

The cable line-up is not without its flaws. I'd love to watch "Sportscenter" in the morning before I go to class, but that'll never happen, and I'd do anything to have CNN, just so I know what's going on in the world. Another way to watch something that's not offered in the dorms is to walk on down to the campus center, and you'll find a full cable line up in the Bluewall and the basement. (Although I recommend not going down there on Monday nights, that's when all the wrestling fans, who think it's real, go make a lot of noise and make fools of themselves.)

However, I'm not complaining, because the line-up we have is much better than most colleges in the country. So if there's even one freshman sitting in the dorm room over in Northeast, worried about the same, unimportant crap that I was when I came here two summers ago, don't fret about it. You can still watch "Friends."

UM businesses

The Student Business Program here at UMass provides undergraduate students with a great opportunity to gain hands-on experience in the cooperative management of a small business.

UMass is the only college or university in the country to have such a program.

Currently, our program supports eight student-run businesses that employ over 160 undergraduate students and that offer a wide range of products and services to the UMass community.

Five of the businesses are located in the Student Union. They include People's Market, Earthfoods Cafe, Campus Design & Copy, the Bike Co-op and Tickets Unlimited.

The remaining three businesses, Greenough Sub Shop, Sweets and More, and Sylvan Snack Bar are located in the Central, Orchard Hill, and Sylvan residential areas respectively. I'm sure anyone in these housing areas will tell you that all of these places are a great place to pick up a late night snack or just to hang out with friends.

All the businesses are non-profit and completely student-run and managed. They follow the philosophy of participatory management. This means the tasks of running the business are broken down and delegated to different committees, which make all decisions by consensus.

In addition to these eight businesses, the program consists of the Center for Student business (CSB) and the Board of Business (BB) — groups designed to assist the students.

The CSB, an agency created by The Student Government Association, provides training, guidance, and advocacy to all eight of the student-run businesses. The Center is supported by a professional staff in addition to a group of undergraduate student consultants who work closely with the individual businesses.

BB is a representative body consisting of two members from each student business, one CSB representative, and one SGA link. The Board serves as a liaison between the businesses, the CSB, the SGA, and the University Administration.

If you need any information regarding the Student Business Program or have any questions, please stop by suite 406 in the Student Union Ballroom or call 545-2166 and ask for Katja or Gloria.

UMass and the Local Entertainment Scene

By Tom Sadlowski
Collegian Staff

With a 16-theater megacomplex opening in Hadley in the fall and an on-campus nightclub that is expected to be open by the start of next semester, the campus' thriving social scene is gaining momentum. The Pioneer Valley is based on music, art and most of all, a good time.

Before you leave UMass, three things are required. First, that you attend a show at the Iron Horse. Second, that you go Disco Bowling, and lastly join a student organization.

If you are looking for live entertainment, then Northampton is the place. The venerable Iron Horse has hosted many artists before they have become famous, most notably in recent pop culture, the Barenaked Ladies and Ben Folds Five. It specializes in singer-songwriter, blues, jazz, pop and other softer genres of music.

Pearl Street is the area's largest venue and has recently brought back Thursday night dances. It offers a small clubroom for acts that have a sound too heavy for the Iron Horse and a 800-person ballroom. Last year, Pearl Street brought acts ranging from Better than Ezra and Fuel to Strangefolk and Maceo Parker.

Off of Main Street in Northampton rests Fire & Water Cafe. Fire & Water produces acoustic shows of regional performers and has had the privilege of welcoming artists before or after they perform at area venues. The cafe also has spoken word and poetry readings and is a great place to grab a cup of coffee.

Northampton has disco bowling, that provides loud music, flashing lights, and a goodtime. Across from the bowling center is Club Metro, an area dance club.

If you aren't looking to travel far from home in search of entertainment, the Amherst Brewing Company presents blues and jazz acts on the weekends. However, you have to be twenty-one plus to enter.

At certain times the Black Sheep, a coffee and pastry shop on Main Street, offers some great local talent.

On-campus, Van Meter and Butterfield house councils regularly host emerging regional and local talent every weekend. These two venues are where most UMass acts get their start.

Something Every Friday offers professional or student performances and a movie in the Campus Center (you guessed it) every Friday.

The Fine Arts Center and Bowker Auditorium regularly have plays, but other than that it is left to the student organizations.

If you are looking to get involved, look to the UMass Ski 'n' Board Club, as they offer discount ski trips and learn-to days at many of the major Northeast mountains. They also have trips to Canada, the Mid-West and outside the U.S., as well.

The Outing Club puts on white-water rafting trips, camping, hiking and cross-country skiing. For both of these organizations, early registration is desireable as trips fill up fast.

UMass also hosts one of the few college car racing programs in the country. UMass Motorsports travels across the Northeast to race their Volkswagon in the Sports Car Club of America. They are currently looking to expand their fleet after numerous top three performances.

Looking to stay inside? You can get involved with the campus radio station, WMUA, or the Collegian. Both offer a wide range of oppurtunities and experience. WMUA's sports department is top-notch and is the flagship for many UMass sports.

The Student Government Association (SGA) is one of the few student governments in the country that is officialy recognized by their legislature through the Board of Trustees. They hold a large amount of power when they are well organized.

SGA is comprised of a senate, judiciary, and cabinet. It has six area governments and numerous house councils to also get involved in. Information is generally available at the begining of each semester on how to get involved.

What is really great about the university is the student businesses that offer a cooperative learning environment for students while providing great services to the student body.

Pick up your morning bagel and coffee at People's Market, grap lunch at Earthfoods, and get your bike tuned up at the Bike Co-Op. There is also a copy center, ticket store, and snack bars throughout different residential areas.

University Productions & Concerts is another organization to get involved with. This organization is responsible for producing the Spring Concert, where every one from U2 to the Grateful Dead have performed at, to other smaller shows at the university. It is a great way to launch your career in the music industry.

Dear Incoming Freshmen,
My friend and I have a theory that if you go to Harvard and wind up with Felicity's roommate, then Harvard is still going to suck. On the other hand, if you go to East Bum U. and Katie Holmes moves in down the hall, then things are looking up. You get the idea; It's the people not the place.

Stars Shining

AFTER THE PARTY
Push Stars
Capitol

Boston's premier emerging act, the Push Stars, shine in their long anticipated major label debut. By combining excellent songwriting, catchy melodies and amazing harmonies, the band has the potential to become a household name.

Captivating the listener right from the start with "Any Little Town" to the interesting "Drunk Is Better Than Dead", the Push Stars present a remarkable album.

"Cinderella" calmly tells of the band's songwriter and guitarist Chris Trapper's family and how his older brother taught him how to play guitar.

The album also features "Everything Shines" from the movie "There's Something About Mary".

Trapper emerges only with his guitar on the soothing "Sofkurl's Room", which showcases Trapper's amazing abilities. The rich sounding "Cash" is a special treat as it features instruments ranging from a piano to the mandolin. The Push Stars are destined for the sky with this release.(A-)

Men's hoops gets "stuck"

By Aaron Saykin
Collegian Staff

Monty Mack was only trying to narrow the deficit to two points for the Massachusetts basketball team.

Instead, he did something that was slightly more symbollic of the entire season.

His Minutemen were trailing by four points to Xavier during the second round of the 1999 Atlantic 10 Tournament. Just one minute left in regulation.

Mack launched an errant running jumper toward the hoop, and then followed his shot, grabbing the rebound. The junior guard attempted a quick put-back shot which bounced four times on the back of the rim. And suddenly, the ball became wedged between the basket and the backboard.

The resulting call was a jump ball with possession favoring the Musketeers.

"I said to myself right there, 'It's just been that type of season'," said coach Bruiser Flint, who almost seemed glad that the Almighty had finally pulled the plug on the Minutemen season. "We've just been wedged between the basket."

No moment could have better represented the 1998-99 season for UMass, whiched watched its lofty expectations dwindle into a disappointing 14-16 campaign. Lari Ketner was supposed to be an NBA lottery draft pick. Ajmal Basit was supposed to be among the top rebounders in the conference. Charlton Clarke was supposed to speed up the offense and develop a fast-break attack. The Minutemen were also supposed to qualify for the NCAA Tournament for an eighth consecutive season... but none of these ever happened.

It's difficult to point to one moment in particular to find the root of all the team's troubles. The first indicator, though, was likely the thumping Flint's squad took at the hands of host Marshall in the fourth game of the season. Then, on Dec. 29, the Minutemen blew a 15-point lead to Davidson, eventually losing the game in overtime. Just eight days later, Iona whipped UMass at the Mullins Center, 77-58. Then another loss came, this time at St. Bonaventure. Something had to give for the Minutemen.

And it did, for at least one day, when UMass upset No. 15 Kansas, 64-60, and the fans rushed onto the floor. But the game, which Flint thought might be the turning point for his team, was followed by three losses in the next five contests — the worst of which came at the Mullins Center against Fordham, which had previously never won a road game in the A-10.

Despite setback after setback, the Minutemen still had a chance to qualify for the post-season, whether it be the NCAA Tournament or the N.I.T. The only way in which UMass could reach the Big Dance was with an A-10 Conference Tournament Title, which they had almost no chance of winning with Clarke nursing a broken foot.

As for the N.I.T., the Minutemen would have to finish over .500 to qualify, but fell one game short. A win at La Salle on February 23 would have lifted UMass into the post- season, but it was not to be.

The problems with the team also spread to off-court issues during the trying campaign. Before the preseason even began, Mack was accused of assaulting a female in Hampshire Dining Commons, but the charges were dismissed in Northampton District Court. During the team's Dec. 12 game against Boston College, Ketner was benched for violating team rules. On February 9, Basit, who had been bumped from the starting lineup a month and a half earlier, was removed due to "conduct detrimental to the team". And, once the season ended, sophomore guard Rafael Cruz asked Flint for his transfer walking papers, but wound up in quite the fix. He had originally planned on attending Marshall University, but the school opted to pass on him. He had no second option.

Jonathan DePina also joined the ranks of those looking to transfer, but left the door open for a return, unlike Cruz. Unsuccessful in his search, DePina will be back in Amherst in the fall as the back-up point guard to sophomore Shannon Crooks, who sat out the 1998-99 season under NCAA transfer rules.

UMass returns three of five starters next year. Mike Babul (small forward), Chris Kirland (power forward), and Mack (shooting guard) will be joined by Crooks and Kitwana Rhymer (center) in the predicted starting five.

BRIAN MCDERMOTT / COLLEGIAN

Monty Mack was one of the stars of the hardwood for the UMass men's basketball team this past winter. Coach Bruiser Flint will rely on him again next season.

Men's gymnasts finish 1999 season with success

By Gary Mendese
Collegian Staff

The year 1999 will ring more bells and bring back more memories than any other year for the Massachusetts men's gymnastics team.

During the 1998-1999 season, the gym team had its best year ever, breaking Temple University's eight-year run as ECAC Champion, advancing to NCAA Regionals for the first time in school history and having one of its members become UMass' first four-peat All-American, Jeff LaVallee. Despite a rough start in the season, bringing with it many injuries and low scores, the team came through with a season that its 19 members will never forget.

COURTESY MEDIA RELATIONS
Jeff Lavallee

LaVallee walked away as the top Minutemen at every meet of the season, as he broke the school all-time records in the all-around (58.275), vault (9.80), parallel bars (9.90) and high bar (9.90), while setting the fourth place score on floor (9.75), fifth on pommel horse (9.775) and third on the still rings (9.925). LaVallee took four All-America Honors as NCAA Nationals — the first Minuteman in 25 years to receive the prestigious honor. The 2000 Olympic hopeful looks to advance to the World Championships this winter.

Senior captain Stephen Pryor, who was always a major contributor to the team, finished his career with five Athlete of the Week awards and holds the second highest score in school history in the all-around competition (57.825), parallel bars (9.70) and high bar (9.80).

Phil Lieberman will be missed. He came out of the woodwork and snagged the gold medal on high bar at the ECAC Championships, and leaves UMass with an untouchable record of 9.875 on the floor exercise.

Last season was a great one for the Minutemen. It had the opportunity to compete at NCAA Regionals for the first time, placing 7th at the meet. UMass faced big guns like Michigan, Illinois, Penn State and Ohio this year, hosted ECAC's with Olympic Champion Shannon Miller as the commentator, and much more can be expected from this relatively young team.

The 1999 NCAA Champions, the Michigan Wolverines, will be coming to UMass this upcoming season, bringing with them both fans and much needed publicity. The year 2000 will surely prove to be not only the start of a new millennium, but also the beginning of a new and improved gymnastics team. It took a great deal of determination for the squad to make it to NCAA Regionals, so with great recruits and increased skills and consistency, a trip to NCAA Nationals can be expected in the near future.

UMass hardballers have year full of ups and downs

By Kathleen Ralls
Collegian Staff

It wasn't their best year. The team, unheralded of a major player, one who stood out in his silky maroon polyester shirt, pieced together a troublesome season full of blowouts, on both ends, and close calls that rattled the team's chemistry but never broke the bond.

This is the story of the 1999 season for the Massachusetts baseball team.

After losing pro prospects Doug Clark (currently playing in the Giants organization), Scott Barnsby, Ryan Cameron and Muchie Dagliere, the Minutemen strung together a new conglomerate led by five seniors; Bill Cooke, Seth Kaplan, Bryan Mazzaferro, Brian Samela and Aaron Bruanstein.

Dropping the first six games, UMass played North Carolina St. and South Florida, schools that had two months of fair weather on their side. But Spring Break turned in their favor, adhesing five wins to the left column. After that, the Minutemen went on a hot streak, going 16-6, including weekend sweeps over conference rivals Xavier, Temple and Fordham, and featuring an 8-game win streak.

Standing atop of the Atlantic 10 at 10-2, UMass looked as if it had trumped its lack of experience.

Samela stepped it up at the plate, amassing 15 doubles (at press time) while calling most of the games from behind the plate. Braunstein redis-covered his power, tallying 12 long balls (at press time).

This continued into the opening round of the Beanpot Tournament at Fenway Park, beating Harvard in a nailbiting 13-12 battle. However, UMass lost its first game ever in the tournament to Boston College in the championship, 4-2.

Unfortunately, this exposed an open wound as UMass slid into despair. Two days later, it dropped a three-game home series to Rhode Island on May 1 and 2.

The most unfortunate news was not the actual losses, however, but of the loss of second baseman Shaun Skeffington, who broke his wrist in the series. The Fall River native had maintained a .319 batting average with seven doubles and three home runs and ranked among the national leaders in stolen bases.

The results of the A-10 Tournament were not available at press time, but it suffices to say that UMass had a solid nucleus of players returning, as it strives to make it back to the NCAA Regionals.

Chris Szado and Travis Veracka will be relied on to head up a young pitching crew along with Iesse Santos, Bill Loonie, Nick Skirkanich and Todd Samolewicz.

At the plate, Mike Kulak will be expected retain his level of excellence which he started in his rookie season. Skeffington will return, along with Chris Morgan, Nick Gorneault, Scott Anderson, Steve Asadoorian, and Gavin Clark.

Latest Movie News

If you're anything like me, then you love juicy gossip and no place produces better rumors than Hollywood. Here's the latest buzz on a slew of upcoming projects, including enough sequels to keep your head whirling well into next year.

Anthony Hopkins has reportedly been signed on to the Mission Impossible sequel. Hopkins will play Tom Cruise's (double-crossing?) boss in the sequel to the enormously popular action flick, due out sometime this December.

The title for the next Batman movie has been announced. It's Batman: Dark Knight. The villain for this one is The Scarecrow with support from Manbat. While Cuba Gooding Jr. has been rumored for the latter part, both Geoffrey Rush and Liam Neeson are being considered to play Scarecrow.

Bruce Wayne (Still George Clooney?) questions whether or not he should retire as Batman, and of course that changes as Manbat and Scarecrow raise havoc in Gotham City. Meanwhile Robin is away at college, which splits him up from Batman.

Pixar has announced the name of its next computer animated movie; Monsters, Inc. The movie, set for release in 2001, looks much darker than Pixar's past offerings, Toy Story and A Bug's Life.

Under Suspicion, a story following a police officer's investigation into a dead corpse found by an attorney, has drawn both Morgan Freeman and Gene Hackman to the script. Freeman will play a police captain who investigates the mystery, while Hackman is the prominent attorney who discovers the corpse during a small street festival. Italy's Monica Bellucci also stars in the film, which is set for release next year.

Director John Boorman (Deliverance) has come aboard the film adaptation of the classic 1904 Jack London novel The Sea Wolf. Although no stars have been confirmed, Nicolas Cage has been rumored to be involved.

Sandra Bullock plays a big-city newspaper columnist forced to enter a drug and alcohol rehab center after getting a traffic ticket for driving under the influence in her latest film, 28 Days.

Apparently, Swingers stars Vince Vaughn and Jon Favreau will be teaming up again for another film written by Favreau. Guam goes to the Moon is about a bunch of NASA rejects who get bounced out of the program for disciplinary reasons and go to Guam to start a space program of their own.

Vince Vaughn has also reportedly been added to the cast Shanghai Noon, where Vaughn will join up with martial arts master, Jackie Chan, and Sammo Hung. Chan plays a Chinese man who travels to the Wild West (this seems popular lately) to rescue a kidnapped princess. After teaming up with a train robber, the unlikely duo takes on a Chinese traitor and his corrupt boss.

The new, and hopefully final, The Crow movie has finished shooting. The Crow: Salvation centers around a boy and his mother viciously murdered on Halloween. He comes back to life a year later, not knowing that he is one of the chosen of the crow. He grows up to be a hitman and discovers his abilities, on the verge of an apocalyptic war between Heaven and Hell. Eric Mabius, Kirsten Dunst and Fred Ward star in this third film of the series which has a tentative US release date of March 2000.

In the "Oh God" category, Jennifer Love Hewitt has confirmed another I Know What You Did Last Summer sequel. Come on, what's the title going to be? I Wicked Still Know? How bad can these films get?

Adam Sandler has reportedly signed to star in The Wedding Singer sequel for an impressive $25 million. With his recent success, Sandler has elevated himself to the level of other top notch Hollywood stars.

I love Back to the Future films as much as anyone, but another one? Apparently so. Steven Spielberg and Ed Solomon are working on getting the film up. The script supposedly follows Christopher Lloyd's Doc Brown, who causes the Roswell UFO to crash and then has to fix it. Michael J. Fox might act as another ancestor of Marty McFly.

Producer Dino DeLaurentiis has offered author Thomas Harris $9 million for the rights to the sequel of "Silence of the Lambs." The story revolves around one of Hannibal Lecter's original victims, who survives. The man haunts Lecter and Agent Sterling, now discredited by the FBI, forms an alliance with him.

Coach Whipple and UMass surprise nation by taking home D–IAA crown

Admit it, you were one of the many.

You were one of the skeptics from which the Massachusetts football team thrived on.

But it's not your fault, and you certainly were not alone. Just a year removed from a 2–9 record, coach Mark Whipple mentioned upon his hiring that his ultimate goal was to win the national championship.

Jaws outnumbered feet on the floor.

It was that doubt, though, that carried the Minutemen to the NCAA Division I–AA National Championship, their first and the university's second at any sport.

Upon arriving in Chattanooga, Tenn., for championship weekend, Georgia Southern, undefeated and untested, was more worried about covering the spread than winning the game. It turned out the Eagles couldn't even come through on the latter. Then were outplayed and outhustled by the Minutemen, as running back Marcel Shipp scampered for 244 yards and the UMass defense forced seven turnovers to lead the Maroon and White to a 55–45 victory.

In the words of Shipp, the tailback who ran for over 2,000 yards and shouldered the load many a–time, Georgia Southern came to talk and the Minutemen came to play football – and that's what UMass did.

With the win came national recognition.. finally. Whipple, the mastermind behind the run for the roses, took home a carload of coach's awards. And now, with 15 starters back, becomes a target, as each opponent will be looking to knock off last year's defending national champion.

The NFL picked up on the Minutemen's success, as the Chicago Bears selected linebacker and senior co–captain Khari Samuel in the fifth round of April's draft, becoming the first Minuteman player to be drafted since Sandro Vitiello was drafted in the 10th round of the 1980 draft by the Cincinnati Bengals.

Tight end Kerry Taylor signed a free–agent deal with the Detroit Lions, while wide receiver Jimmy Moore and the New England Patriots are talking about uniting.

From the heartbreaking 33–30 loss at Delaware in the season opener to the heart attack at home against Lehigh in the second round of the playoffs, last year's Minutemen quickly turned the town of Amherst into a football town, or "Title Town", if you will.

Fans began using up their Saturday afternoons painting their faces and screaming mercilessly until the final gun. Thanks to 1998's edition of Minuteman football, the line has been redrawn so a successful season might only be achieved with an encore performance.

Softball team brings home A–10's

Excellence is a quality that every athletic team strives to achieve. For the past 14 seasons, the Massachusetts softball team has advanced to the Atlantic 10 Conference Championship. That type of success is characteristic of the program.

The Minutewomen demonstrated to the nation why they are the best team in the Northeast region by capturing the 1999 edition of the A–10 Championship.

The No. 16 Massachusetts softball (41–8) won an unmatched fifth straight conference championship on May 9th in Salem, Va., winning all three games of the tournament and improving their conference record to 16–1.

UMass was once again powered by senior All–American Danielle Henderson, who won all three games for the Minutewomen while surrendering only one run in 21 innings. The squad beat Dayton 6–1 on Friday the 7th, blanked St. Joseph's 5–0 on Saturday the 8th before knocking out Virginia Tech 2–0 on May 9th.

The win solidified an automatic berth to the NCAA Regional Championships which were set to begin on May 20th. The conference championship also makes a strong case to the selection committee that the Minutewomen should host the regional.

Henderson, the 1999 A–10 pitcher of the year, pitched a one–hitter for UMass in game one on Friday against the Dayton Flyers. The senior who, the week before was named the National Player of the Week, struck out 17 batters to power the team and break her own record for strikeouts in a conference tournament game.

Game two was equally as lopsided for the Minutewomen. UMass blanked St. Joseph's for five runs to avenge their only A–10 loss of the year and advance to the conference championship game.

The final match yesterday pitted the two top A–10 teams against each other in a rematch of last week's doubleheader. The Minutewomen swept last week's action against Virginia Tech at home behind two dominating performances by Henderson.

The Commack, NY, native returned to the mound in the Hokies' backyard with the conference championship on the line. Henderson shut down the Hokies once again. She struck out 15 while giving up only two hits and one walk.

The only runs of the game came in the fourth inning off of the bat of Mandy Galas. The second baseman singled home pinch runner Ashley Bakken and senior speedster Katie Kenderski in the fourth inning to give UMass a 2–0 lead. UMass next looked to return to the College World Series.

What stood between the Massachusetts women's outdoor track and field team and their first Atlantic 10 Championship was a surging Virginia Tech squad. The perfect backdrop was set for triumph and glory, and the Minutewomen did not disappoint.

It was an monumental weekend for the women's program, to say the least. Not only did the Minutewomen bring home their first A–10 outdoor championship, coach Julie LaFreniere was named conference Coach of the Year.

To go along with the title and the Coach of the Year honors, UMass had five athletes named to the All Conference team. The Massachusetts All–Conference selections were headed by seniors Rose Bryan, Shelanda Irish and Raquell Shelton. Joining the trifecta of seniors were freshman Abby Rubino and junior Sally Hirsch.

The A–10 Championships were decided in the final event of the weekend, the 4x400m relay. UMass was in first place going into the finale and atop they stood at the conclusion. The Minutewomen went into the event with a 202 points, but they could ill afford an early celebration because Virginia Tech was grabbing at their heels with 196 points.

All that was needed from the 4x400m relay team was a fifth place finish. A fifth place finish would ensure UMass at least a share of the title assuming a Virginia Tech win in the weekends final competition.

"It was the greatest feeling [winning the A–10's]," Rubino said. "Everyone stepped up. We pulled together as a team. We deserved to win. The coaches wanted it."

It was the final conference meet for six seniors (Bryan, Irish, Shelton, Nicole Way, Melanie Bell, and Tracy Meagher).

"The six seniors have done a tremendous job for the program. We dedicated the championship to them," LaFreniere said.

Bryan scored an astounding 29 points en route to her All– Conference selection. She finished second in the 100m hurdles in a school record time of 13.79 seconds. The senior finished third in the triple jump and was a member of the first place 4x100m relay.

The 4x100m relay team beat a seemingly unbeatable Virginia Tech squad. The team of Bryan, Shelton, Rubino, and Irish edged out the Hokie team by :00.16.

LaFreniere said, "Our baton hand–offs were the best of the year."

Not to be outdone was Hirsch. The junior distance runner set the conference record in the 5,000m with a time of 17:22.68. This performance was on the heels of second place finish in the 3,000m.

Water polo ends in top ten

True to their pre–tournament seed, the Massachusetts women's water polo team captured a 10th place finish at this weekend's National Championships in Davis, California. UMass dropped an emotional 6–5 sudden death overtime contest to host UC–Davis, then knocked off No. 15 Michigan (8–4) and No. 11 Long Beach State (9–8) before closing play with an 8–6 loss to No. 9 San Jose State.

"We proved to the country that we can play at the top national level," Coach Dan McOsker said. "We can really build on that for next year."

UMass' first match, against the No. 7 Aggies of Davis, proved to be a real nail–biter. The host team rallied from a 4–1 deficit and nearly won it in the first overtime, until a goal by UM junior field player Laurie Edwards with three seconds left forced sudden death.

"I knew that we were up a man with very little time on the clock," said Edwards, who took a pass from co–captain Claudia Clement and went high–left for the score. "Thank God that ball went in."

The celebration was short–lived, however, as Aggie Lenelle Dorfi put away a goal and the Minutewomen with 1:17 remaining in sudden death. UM freshman goalkeeper Dana Sinkwich set a school record with 16 saves in the contest.

UMass then faced the No. 15 Michigan Wolverines, whom the Minutewomen had beaten 9–2 at February's Villanova Invitational. Behind the balanced attack of Katie Grogan, Edwards, and freshman Jacqui Goodhue (two goals each), UMass prevailed in an 8–4 final.

The 49ers of Long Beach State were next up for the Maroon and White. Californian Grogan used this game as her personal showcase, racking up five goals and accounting for all of UMass' second–half offense. Ten more saves from Sinkwich kept the 49ers at bay, and the Minutewomen held on for a 9–8 victory.

The win was the 31st of the year for UMass, breaking last year's record for most wins in a season.

Sunday's tourney–closing matchup pitted UMass against No. 9 San Jose State. Fatigue was a big factor for the Minutewomen, whose offense seemed to tread water as the Spartans bested them in an 8–6 final.

Clement tallied three goals in the loss, giving the Guam native seven on the weekend and one in every game.

"Over the last three weeks, the girls really came together and played as a team," McOsker said.

"The respect they've earned really helps us out with recruiting. With a good freshman class coming in, the sky's the limit for us next year."

Lax teams face hard times

By Sanford Appell and Paul Teves

They were seasons of high hopes and great expectations for both the Massachusetts men's and women's lacrosse teams, but both teams struggled early on and suffered some devastating losses on and off the field, which led to disappointing years for both clubs.

It was a particularly trying season for the Massachusetts men's lacrosse team. The squad not only suffered through a disappointing 4–8 campaign, but lost team member Eric Sopracasa to a tragic accident as well.

Sopracasa, a junior defenseman was struck with a ball in the chest during practice, and consequently passed away before the season finale at Brown.

Inexperience was one of the prime explanations for the Minutemen's lack of success on the field. UMass entered play with 27 underclassmen, an unusually large group by college lacrosse standards.

Nonetheless, the Minutemen remained competitive with some of the best teams in the nation, including No. 1 Loyola, and No. 2 Duke.

UMass was the only team to hold Loyola under ten goals in a 9–5 loss on March 27.

Expectations will be high for the 2000 campaign, as two sophomores emerged as stars for the Minutemen this past season.

John Madigan and Rich Kunkel finished first and second for the team scoring title with 31 and 29 points respectively.

Additionally, second–year goalkeeper Chris Campolettano established himself as a worthy incumbent to John Kasselakis, who guarded the pipes before him.

With those components in place and the likes of sophomore returnees Marc Morley and Don Littles in tow, a return to the NCAA Tournament is a likely possibility in 2000.

For the women the team's 9–6 campaign came to an end after UMass left Geasey Field in Philadelphia one goal shy of opponent Virginia Tech in the Atlantic 10 Tournament semifinals in it's inaugural season.

The Minutewomen had a solid season despite the trials and tribulations they had to endure as well. The Minutewomen dealt with a slew of injuries. At one point, the Minutewomen were missing seven players from their lineup, most of which were impact players.

The Minutewomen also dealt with some early season losses — to Boston University, Syracuse and Brown — and rebounded to save a season, where the expectation was a trip NCAAs. But the Minutewomen salvaged their conference schedule going 4–1 in their first A–10 season, and advanced to the tournament. UMass' only loss in conference during the regular season was a 6–5 loss to Temple.

The future of UMass women's lax is looking good yet again, as that huge junior class matures to the senior level. With Melissa Miele exploding this year and Noelle Gorski having another great season, on draws and scoring wise, Stephanie Pavlick will be back for all of next season, as well as junior defender Colleen Wales, who missed the entire season with an ACL tear. Also on D' will be Lynne Young, who is one of UMass' most solid players, while Denise Brey will also make a contribution from the junior class.

Sophomore Jen Nardi, who was the best goalie in the nation in terms of save percentage and tenth in the nation in GAA, will also be returning to the Minutewomen's lineup.
